1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will conclude that a decision does not include an implicit interpretation that resolves an apparent tension between a comprehensive plan policy and a local code provision where nothing cited to LUBA in the findings indicates that the local government recognized, much less attempted to resolve, the tension. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 81 Or LUBA 839 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA reviews interpretations of conditions of approval to determine whether they are correct. Matthews v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 757 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a condition of approval for a nonfarm dwelling provides that "[t]he proposed dwelling site shall be located as represented by the applicant's written statements and approved site plan" and that "[a]ny deviation from this representation shall require an application for a modification of conditions with the applicable fees subject to the Planning Director's discretion," a hearings official misinterprets that condition by concluding that it provides the director discretion regarding whether a modification application will be required; instead, that condition provides the director discretion to review and issue decisions on modification applications. Matthews v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 757 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Because maximum lot standards regulate how an accessory dwelling can be sited on a lot (e.g., interior versus attached or detached), as with setbacks, and not whether one can be sited at all, as with minimum lot size standards and density limitations, such regulations relate to "siting" for purposes of ORS 197.312(5)(a). Home Builders Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 764 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a petitioner challenges a local government's justifications for a 50 percent maximum lot coverage standard, but where there is no evidence in the record or argument from the petitioner that the standard is not "within the bounds of reason," or is "extreme," "excessive," or not "moderate," the petitioner has not established that the standard is not "reasonable" for purposes of ORS 197.312(5)(a). Home Builders Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 764 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a petitioner argues that local code provisions regulating the size of accessory dwellings differently in different areas of the city based on lot size are not reasonable because (1) they could make conversion of existing single-family dwellings difficult and operate to discourage conversions, (2) lot size is not related to the size of a primary dwelling, and (3) the provisions allow potentially larger accessory dwellings on smaller lots in some zones and limit the size of accessory dwellings on larger lots in other zones, but where the petitioner has not established that the provisions "conflict[] with reason" or are "absurd," "ridiculous," or "extreme," the petitioner has not established that the provisions are not "reasonable" for purposes of ORS 197.312(5)(a). Home Builders Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 764 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. That a sloped setback and building height requirement for attached accessory dwellings may make it more expensive to convert an existing floor area into an attached accessory dwelling does not establish that such a consequence makes the requirement not "reasonable" for purposes of ORS 197.312(5)(a). Home Builders Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 764 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local government adopts a statutory definition into its land use regulations, the local definition cannot, on its face, violate the statute from which it is taken or any other statute. Home Builders Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 764 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that site design review be based upon consideration of the "[c]haracteristics of adjoining and surrounding uses," the local government does not err by characterizing adjoining and surrounding uses simply as farm uses, even where the adjoining and surrounding lands contain dwellings, where the lands are zoned for farm and forest uses, where the dwellings are allowed in conjunction with farm and forest uses, and where the purpose of the zones and the comprehensive plan is to protect and conserve farm and forest lands for farm and forest uses. Anderson v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 618 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision allows "public utility facilities, including substations and transmission lines," in a particular zone, the governing body does not err by concluding that a utility facility is "public" so long as it is necessary for the public health, safety, and welfare, even if it is not publicly owned; that a utility facility benefits the public health, safety, and welfare by increasing the overall capacity and redundancy within the larger utility system; and that a utility facility is "public" even if it benefits the public generally and not just residents of the local community. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Tillamook County, 81 Or LUBA 633 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provides that a use not listed in a particular zone may be permitted in that zone if it is "of the same general character, or has similar impacts on nearby properties, as do other uses permitted in the zone," the governing body does not err by concluding that a particular use satisfies that criterion even if it has lesser negative impacts than permitted uses. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Tillamook County, 81 Or LUBA 633 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government need not interpret the term "protect" the same way in the context of a statewide planning goal that does not protect a specific, unique natural resource or specific recreation area that it does in the context of a goal that does protect those things, even where the definitions of "protect" in the latter goal and in the local government's comprehensive plan are identical. Crowley v. City of Hood River, 81 Or LUBA 490 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the local code provides that certain applications (1) must be "submitted on a form provided by the [Planning] Director," (2) "must be reviewed" pursuant to Type II procedures, (3) "may be reviewed" pursuant to Type I procedures in certain circumstances, and (3) "shall not be considered accepted solely because of having been received," the planning director has discretion to reject an application filed on an incorrect form. Mattson v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 526 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a comprehensive plan provision allows "minor navigational improvements" in a particular zone, which it defines as "alterations necessary to provide water access to existing or permitted uses in conservation management units," an interpretation of that provision as not requiring that the use for which the alteration is needed and the alteration itself be located in the same zone is consistent with the provision's express language; however, an interpretation of that provision as allowing alterations that are needed for a use that is not located in a "conservation management unit" is inconsistent the provision's express language. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a comprehensive plan management objective allows "a limited boat dock for transient recreation craft tie-up" in a particular zone, and the uses and activities matrix for the zone allows "docks" without limitation, but a different comprehensive plan provision states that uses and activities matrices are "subordinate" to management objectives and that allowed uses and activities must be "consistent" with the management objectives, a local government errs by allowing nonlimited boat docks in the zone. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that a "declaration of anticipated noise levels" be attached to certain land use approvals and that applicants incorporate noise abatement strategies where noise levels are anticipated to exceed a certain threshold, the word "declaration" anticipates more than a statement from the applicant's attorney, without supporting documents or studies, and a reasonable person would not rely on such statements alone to conclude that the noise threshold is not exceeded. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In considering an application for a relative farm help dwelling, a local government is not limited to considering the commercial farming operation occurring on the property on the date the application is filed, and the local government does not err by considering whether a new crop planted after the application is filed, either alone or in combination with the existing operation, is an "existing commercial farming operation" within the meaning of OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a). Wachal v. Linn County, 81 Or LUBA 561 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 215.750 and OAR 660-006-0005(5) allow a county to approve a forest template dwelling if, after applying a 160-acre template centered on the subject property, at least seven other "lots or parcels that existed on January 1, 1993, are" within the 160-acre area. A hearings officer's interpretation of a local code provision implementing the statute and the rule to conclude that an applicant failed to meet the seven-lot requirement because two parcels that existed on January 1, 1993, were later reconfigured pursuant to a major partition is inconsistent with the statute and the rule because the administrative rule history of the rule indicates that LCDC did not intend to prohibit an applicant from relying on a post-January 1, 1993 reconfiguration of a parcel so long as "the effect of" the later reconfiguration was not "to qualify a lot, parcel or tract for the siting of a dwelling." Tugaw v. Jackson County, 81 Or LUBA 458 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where comprehensive plan provisions provide, using mandatory language, that certain resource plan and zoning designations shall be used to conserve or protect fish and wildlife habitat from conflicting uses and that land use proposals that have undesirable impacts on those resources shall be reviewed during the plan and zone amendment processes, a local governing body errs in interpreting those provisions to conclude that it may apply nonresource plan and zoning designations to property mapped as fish and wildlife habitat and that any impacts may be evaluated and, if necessary, mitigated during subsequent review of development proposals. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Linn County, 81 Or LUBA 338 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a county code provision provides that a nonconforming use may not be resumed if there is a "discontinuance" for a period greater than one year, the county board of commissioners does not err in interpreting the undefined term "discontinuance" by resorting to the dictionary definition and in applying that interpretation to conclude that a property owner who is actively pursuing permits to complete repairs and upgrades that are required for health and safety reasons, and who is actively responding to appeals of those permits, has not discontinued a nonconforming use. Such an interpretation and application of the term "discontinuance" in the county code provision is not contrary to the term "interruption" in ORS 215.130(7)(a). Campbell v. Columbia County, 81 Or LUBA 385 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where one local code provision requires that "the characteristics of the site [be] suitable for the proposed use considering size, shape, location, topography and natural features"; and where another local code provision requires that development plans "be reviewed to assess the possible presence of any geologic hazard" and provides that, if a geologic hazard is suspected, the developer must submit a report "which satisfactorily evaluates the degree of hazard present and recommends appropriate precautions to avoid endangering life and property and minimize erosion," and provides that "[t]he burden of proof is on the landowner to show that it is safe to build"; LUBA will defer to the governing body's interpretation that an applicant's geologic report related to the "safe to build" criterion, rather than the "suitability" criterion. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Bandon, 81 Or LUBA 285 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that uses be conducted "wholly within an enclosed structure"; where the local code defines "structure" as both "[a]nything which is constructed, erected or built and located on or under the ground, or attached to something fixed to the ground," and "[a] walled and roofed building including a gas or liquid storage tank that is principally above ground"; where the first definition was in effect when the enclosed structure requirement was first enacted; and where the second definition was enacted as part of an ordinance that related to compliance with FEMA's requirements to participate in the National Flood Insurance Program, LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of the enclosed structure requirement, relying on the first definition of "structure," to allow a use that is surrounded by building walls, retaining walls, and fences. Beaverton Business Owners, LLC v. City of Beaverton, 81 Or LUBA 224 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local design guideline provides that "[p]rimary building entrances should be oriented toward and located in close proximity to public streets and public street intersections" and that "[p]roperty size, shape and topographical conditions should also be considered," LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of that guideline to allow the primary entrance to a proposed development to be located on the opposite side of the property and oriented away from public streets where the primary entrance would nevertheless be "in close proximity to" those public streets and connected to those public streets with multiple pedestrian connections, and where the triangular shape of the property and a partially adjacent high-speed on-ramp to a highway support the applicant's choice to cluster the proposed development toward the public streets and provide a primary entrance on the opposite side of the property. Beaverton Business Owners, LLC v. City of Beaverton, 81 Or LUBA 224 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that a proposed conditional use be "consistent with the character of the area," and where nothing in the code defines or describes the relevant study area for purposes of the provision, a local government does not err by expanding the scope of the study area beyond that described in the application. Tarr v. Multnomah County, 81 Or LUBA 242 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code allows community service and residential uses in the same zone, a local government does not err by concluding that a proposed community service use is "consistent with the character of the area," even though it would generate more traffic or noise impacts than a typical residential use, where almost any community service use would generate more traffic and noise impacts than a typical residential use. Tarr v. Multnomah County, 81 Or LUBA 242 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision provides that a refinement plan for property within a master plan area must be consistent with the master plan; where the master plan contains an executive summary, a listing of principles, a discussion section after each principle heading, other sections discussing site features and infrastructure strategy, a variety of graphics, and several other exhibits and attachments; where another local code provision provides that the intent of the master plan is to identify the "goals and policies" for development within the master plan area, and where other local code provisions suggest that "goals" and "policies" are different things, a governing body errs in concluding that merely furthering the principles is sufficient to establish consistency with the master plan and in failing to address provisions of the master plan dictating the strategies that development is required to use in order to actualize the principles—that is, in concluding that a refinement plan need only be consistent with the principles as summarized by their headings. Mumper v. City of Salem, 81 Or LUBA 152 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision authorizes the adoption of refinement plans for areas not less than 40 acres in size, where another local code provision authorizes an adjustment of a development standard if the purpose underlying the standard is "equally or better met" by the proposed development, where the 40-acre standard is intended to avoid piecemeal development, where an applicant proposes a 14-acre refinement plan for an area adjacent to an existing refinement plan area, and where the proposed and existing refinement plan areas will be under common ownership and have physically connected elements, a local government does not err in concluding that the 14-acre refinement plan "equally or better" meets the 40-acre standard and, therefore, may be granted an adjustment. Mumper v. City of Salem, 81 Or LUBA 152 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 197.312(5)(a) does not provide an outright, unqualified entitlement to develop an accessory dwelling unit (ADU) on every property with a single-family dwelling; instead, that statute provides local governments some regulatory discretion in regulating ADUs that could have the effect of prohibiting an ADU on a particular property, so long as the regulation is reasonable and related to "siting and design." Kamps-Hughes v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 193 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. For purposes of ORS 197.312(5)(a), which requires cities to allow accessory dwelling units (ADUs) "subject to reasonable local regulations relating to siting and design," the word "siting" describes a regulation that allows the city to specify the location of an ADU on a site, and it does not allow the city to regulate where in each of the city's residential zones ADUs are allowed based on factors such as traffic, livability, and existing density. Kamps-Hughes v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 193 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under ORS 197.312(5)(a), which requires cities to allow accessory dwelling units (ADUs) "subject to reasonable local regulations relating to siting and design," while regulations prohibiting ADUs on alley access lots, requiring a minimum lot size for ADUs, requiring minimum lot dimensions for ADUs, and limiting ADU occupancy do not relate to "siting" or "design," regulations limiting the percentage of total lot area that can be vehicle use areas, limiting the number of garages or covered parking areas, limiting the dimensions of and requiring minimum setbacks for garages, and limiting driveway widths do relate to "siting" and "design." Kamps-Hughes v. City of Eugene, 81 Or LUBA 193 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where comprehensive plan and local code provisions provide that the comprehensive plan may be amended only when "[t]here is a demonstrated public need for the change," and where another comprehensive plan provision states that the desired land use pattern in the urban growth boundary includes "[n]eighborhoods with a mix of uses, diversity of housing types, pedestrian scale, a defined center and shared public areas," the governing body does not err in concluding that that there is a "public need" to redesignate the subject property to High Density Residential (HDR) because the property is in a neighborhood of low- and medium-density housing and because introducing HDR zoning into the area will allow higher-density housing in a new location within the jurisdiction and potentially increase housing supply and diversity, even where the jurisdiction's acknowledged Buildable Lands Inventory and other, more recent data indicate that there is no deficit of HDR land in the jurisdiction. Carson Property LUBA Appeal, Inc. v. City of Corvallis, 81 Or LUBA 175 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city code provision provides that "[t]he footprint of any other new structure or any horizontal addition requiring at least one footing in ocean bluff areas must be set back from the bluff" a certain distance; where the documents identified by the provision as the resources the city is to consult in order to identify the location of the bluff edge are documents reflecting historic conditions; where grading is not listed as exempt from the requirements of the chapter; where the code does not support the conclusion that the city may, in evaluating the required setback, sever the construction of a structure from the associated grading proposed as site preparation; where the material that the code requires be included in a geological hazard report supports the interpretation that the bluff edge is to be determined based upon existing conditions; and where the code allows variances to be considered to reduce the building setback if the variance helps lessen the risk of erosion or other hazard, an interpretation of the provision as providing that permitted development, such as grading and excavation, can occur prior to establishing the location of the bluff edge is inconsistent with the provision's express language and context for purposes of ORS 197.829(1). Kimbrell v. City of Lincoln City, 81 Or LUBA 10 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. For purposes of a local code provision requiring that a proposed conditional use not "alter the character of the surrounding area in a manner that substantially limits, impairs, or precludes the use of surrounding properties for the primary uses allowed in the zoning district(s) in which surrounding properties are located," the primary use allowed in the Rural Residential Farm Forest 5-Acre zone is the use and occupancy of a dwelling structure, and the local government does not misinterpret the provision in finding that passing by the proposed conditional use on the way to a residence does not limit that use. York v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 20 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A lot or parcel is not ineligible for a lot of record dwelling under ORS 215.705(1)(a) because it was transferred from a pre-1985 owner to a qualifying relative or business entity under ORS 215.705(6) by deed when the pre-1985 owner was still alive, i.e., an inter vivos transfer, rather than by devise or intestate succession after their death. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 75 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A family trust that the record shows was formed for the purpose of managing and eventually disposing of a pre-1985 owner's assets, including real estate, to family members may qualify as a "business entity owned by any one or combination of these family members," within the meaning of ORS 215.705(6), and, therefore, an "owner" of a lot or parcel, within the meaning of ORS 215.705(1)(a), for purposes of establishing a lot of record dwelling. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 75 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A lot or parcel is not ineligible for a lot of record dwelling under ORS 215.705(1)(a) because it was transferred from a pre-1985 owner first to a family trust and then to a qualifying relative under ORS 215.705(6) as part of an estate plan; nothing in ORS 215.705(1)(a) limits the number of transfers of an otherwise qualifying parcel to a single transfer. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 75 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Two parcels are not "under the same ownership" and, therefore, not a "tract," within the meaning of ORS 215.010(2), where one is owned by a person individually and the other is owned by a trust, with the same person serving as trustee. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 75 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A parcel "include[s] a dwelling," making other parcels in the same tract ineligible for a lot of record dwelling under ORS 215.705(1)(b), where a lot of record dwelling has been approved on that parcel, even if construction of it has not yet started. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 75 (2020).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. To the extent that LUBA's holding in Perry v. Yamhill County, 26 Or LUBA 73, 80, aff'd, 125 Or App 588, 865 P2d 1344 (1993), that the reasoning in Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), extends to a local government's interpretation of a prior land use decision, was correct, it was superseded by ORS 197.829(1), which requires LUBA to affirm "a local government's interpretation of its comprehensive plan and land use regulations" but does not require LUBA to affirm a local government's interpretation of a prior land use decision, findings adopted in support thereof, or conditions of approval attached thereto, which LUBA reviews under ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D) to determine whether the local government "[i]mproperly construed the applicable law." M & T Partners, Inc. v. City of Salem, 80 Or LUBA 221 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a significant resource overlay zone provision requires that (1) resource sites not be altered or impacted to a degree that destroys their significance, (2) the proposed development not result in the loss of habitat for threatened or endangered species, (3) all feasible alternatives to the development that would not result in a substantial adverse impact on identified resource values be considered and rejected, (4) the development be sited on the property in such a manner that minimizes adverse impacts on identified resources, and (5) documentation be provided regarding requirements for state or federal permits or licenses and that appropriate resource management agencies have reviewed the development proposal against their plans, policies, and programs, the local government does not err in concluding that that provision applies at the development stage rather than the PAPA stage. VanSickle v. Klamath County, 80 Or LUBA 241 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Although the holding in Beaver State Sand and Gravel vs. Douglas County, 187 Or App 241, 65 P3d 1123 (2003), determined that ORS 215.298(2) prohibits surface mining on EFU-zoned lands unless the property is included on a Goal 5 inventory of significant aggregate resources, nothing in OAR 660-023-0180 prohibits a local government from otherwise maintaining a "Non-Significant Mining Mineral and Aggregate Inventory," adding properties to that inventory, or allowing surface mining on properties included on that inventory pursuant to local code provisions regulating surface mining, and a local government is not required to apply any rules implementing Goal 5 to its decision to add property to that inventory. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 80 Or LUBA 252 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that a minimum of 250 square feet of "outdoor area" be provided for each residential lot and specifically states that the outdoor area may include "decking" and a "covered patio," as long as that covered patio is not "fully enclosed," the local government does not err by concluding that a covered deck that is attached to the dwelling, but not enclosed, can satisfy the minimum outdoor area requirement. Bohan v. City of Portland, 80 Or LUBA 263 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision generally prohibits development and grading in "areas of land movement," LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation of that provision to prohibit development and grading in "an area where a land slide or some other earth movement has already occurred—not an area where such activity could occur." Chang v. Clackamas County, 80 Or LUBA 321 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government errs by finding that compliance with a local code provision prohibiting diversion of storm water into areas with steep slopes and "areas of land movement, slump or earth flow, and mud or debris flow" is satisfied by compliance with a separate local code provision requiring development to provide "[p]ositive drainage and adequate conveyance of surface water * * * from roofs, footings, foundations, and other impervious or near-impervious surfaces to an appropriate discharge point." Chang v. Clackamas County, 80 Or LUBA 321 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The planning commission's conclusion that the subject properties are subject to "site review requirements" is not supported by anything in the text of the Old Code, Ordinance 20224, or the New Code. Simons Investment Properties, LLC v. City of Eugene, 80 Or LUBA 458 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In the context of an application to construct a 94-unit apartment complex, where a local code provision defines "net density" to mean "the number of dwelling units per acre of land in actual residential use and reserved for the exclusive use of the residents in the development, such as common open space or recreation facilities," while a maintenance building and internal parking circulation areas are properly included in the net density calculation, a leasing office should be excluded from the acreage used to calculate net density. Hulme v. City of Eugene, 80 Or LUBA 488 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the Court of Appeals determines that LUBA's decision was "unlawful in substance" pursuant to ORS 197.850(9)(a) because LUBA affirmed the city's interpretation of Goal 8, Policy 1, and according to the court, the city's interpretation of Goal 8, Policy 1 is not affirmable under ORS 197.829(1) because the city's interpretation does not "plausibly account for the text and context of the policy," the appropriate disposition according to OAR 661-010-0071(2)(d) is for LUBA to remand the decision to the city for further proceedings, specifically for the city to adopt a sustainable interpretation of Goal 8, Policy 1, and apply that policy, as interpreted to the application before it. Crowley v. City of Hood River, 79 Or LUBA 77 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision prohibits uses that "alter the character of the surrounding area in a manner that substantially limits, impairs, or precludes the use of surrounding properties," a hearings officer errs in reducing the inquiry into a single inquiry into whether the proposed use makes the use of nearby properties "substantially worse," since the words "limit" and "impair' have different meanings and since, where a local code uses two different terms in the same provision, it is presumed that the enacting body intends two different meanings. York v. Clackamas County, 79 Or LUBA 278 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision requires a finding that a proposed use "will not significantly increase fire hazard or significantly increase fire suppression costs or significantly increase risks to fire suppression personnel," the proper comparison is between the proposed use and the pre-existing use, not between the proposed use and typical uses of the same type. York v. Clackamas County, 79 Or LUBA 278 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the predominant use of a proposed facility controls whether it is permitted in a zone, a local government does not err in concluding that the allocation of two-thirds of the physical space in a building to office uses makes the office use the predominant use of the building, even where the primary purpose of the office uses is to facilitate other uses in the building which are not allowed in the underlying zone. Sky Lakes Medical Center, Inc. v. City of Klamath Falls, 79 Or LUBA 490 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The fact that a proposed second dwelling would have a smaller footprint, less square footage, and fewer bedrooms than an existing dwelling on the same lot is by itself insufficient to establish that the second dwelling is "accessory to" the existing dwelling for purposes of ORS 197.312(5). Kamps-Hughes v. City of Eugene, 79 Or LUBA 500 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The fact that a proposed second dwelling would be located on the same lot as an existing dwelling is sufficient to establish that the second dwelling is "used in connection with" the existing dwelling for purposes of ORS 197.312(5), regardless of whether either dwelling is occupied by the owner of the lot. Kamps-Hughes v. City of Eugene, 79 Or LUBA 500 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code amendment is not inconsistent with an administrative rule, so as to require reversal or remand of the amendment decision, merely because the amendment uses the phrase "ministerial decision" while the rule uses the phrase "administrative decision," where the code does not treat those phrases differently. In addition, a local code amendment is not inconsistent with an administrative rule authorizing counties to grant extensions of permits if they determine the applicant was unable to begin or continue development "for reasons for which the applicant was not responsible" merely because the amendment provides a list of examples of such reasons, especially where the rule provides no definition or guidance for that phrase. McCaffree v. Coos County, 79 Or LUBA 512 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. While a variance should not be used as a substitute for rezoning, a local government does not err in granting a variance without a showing that strict application of the zoning ordinance would cause "practical difficulties or unnecessary hardships because of exceptional or extraordinary circumstances or conditions affecting the applicant's property" in a zone which the local code specifically exempts from that standard. City of Albany v. Linn County, 79 Or LUBA 528 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the only variable between multiple Urban Growth Area-Urban Growth Management (UGA-UGM) zones is lot size, and where a county code provision provides that "[t]he density of one UGA-UGM zoning district is not interchangeable with the density of another UGA-UGM zoning district without prior review and approval by the affected city and * * * County," an interpretation by the county that the provision applies to zone changes of the subject property or changes to the underlying density of the zone in which the subject property is located, but that it does not apply to lot size variances, is inconsistent with the express language of the provision. In such cases, where the local code does not define "density" and the dictionary defines "density" as the quantity or number per unit of area, LUBA will make its own determination that a lot size variance in a UGA-UGM zone may qualify as an "interchange[]" with the density of another UGA-UGM zone, thereby requiring city review and approval. City of Albany v. Linn County, 79 Or LUBA 528 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision provides that "[a]pproval of [a] variance is limited to the minimum necessary to permit otherwise normal development of the property for the proposed use," an interpretation by the local government that the provision means a variance may be approved if it permits development consistent with the surrounding land use pattern and the uses permitted in the underlying zone, and that it does not mean a variance may only be approved if it is necessary to permit development that is allowed in the zone, is not inconsistent with the language of the code or the purposes or policies underpinning the provision. City of Albany v. Linn County, 79 Or LUBA 528 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The fact that a tentative plan for a destination resort proposes a different pace of development than the final master plan, such as by sub-phasing development, does not materially affect the findings of fact on which the final master plan approval was based so as to constitute a "substantial change" to the final master plan, thereby requiring a new application, where neither the final master plan nor applicable regulations require that all development authorized in the first phase of the final master plan occurs at the same time. Gould v. Deschutes County, 79 Or LUBA 561 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the final master plan for a destination resort includes a mitigation plan requiring the applicant to replace the water consumed by the resort with a quantity and quality of water that will maintain fish habitat in an impacted stream, the fact that the tentative plan for one phase of development modifies the timing, but not the overall amount, of the mitigation water required to be provided does not materially affect the findings of fact on which the final master plan approval was based so as to constitute a "substantial change" to the final master plan, thereby requiring a new application, where there is no evidence that such modification will impact the efficacy of mitigation and there is evidence that such modification will result in more gradual, spread out impacts. Gould v. Deschutes County, 79 Or LUBA 561 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code provision provides that issuance of a conditional use permit requires a determination that "[t]he proposed use is or may be made compatible with existing adjacent permitted uses and other uses permitted in the underlying zone," an interpretation by the local government that it need not consider the impact of the proposed use on property values and neighbor peace of mind is not inconsistent with the provision's express language or underlying policies. Currie v. Douglas County, 79 Or LUBA 585 (2019).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When the county is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1), the decision can be reversed only if the interpretation is inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy underlying the relevant code language. Under a non-deferential standard of review petitioner must demonstrate that the commissioners' interpretation is reversible. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 78 Or LUBA 81 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A petitioner may not also operate an exotic animal rescue facility, which is undisputedly not a "farm use," on EFU land where the petitioner uses his or her EFU-zoned property for certain "farm uses," under ORS 215.203. The existing "farm use[s]" do not "legitimize" the concurrent unpermitted uses, nor do they shield the unpermitted uses from county code enforcement action. A Walk on the Wild Side v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 356 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The statute of limitations in ORS 131.125(8)(c) is inapplicable to a county's separate land use enforcement proceeding procedures pursuant to a county code that does not contain any time limitation for enforcement actions for violations of the county's land use code, because the county has authority over land use code enforcement matters independent from any statutorily derived authority in ORS Title 14 pursuant to county charter, and because ORS 153.030(4) expressly provides that "[n]othing in this chapter affects the ability of any other political subdivision of this state to provide for the administrative enforcement of the charter, ordinances, rules and regulations of the political subdivision, including enforcement through imposition of monetary penalties." A Walk on the Wild Side v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 356 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer's interpretation is inadequate for review before LUBA where the hearings officer finds that that a proposed bed and breakfast inn designed for occupancy by an employee caretaker and up to eight non-resident guests qualifies as a "bed and breakfast inn," without explaining how a caretaker occupancy is consistent with the county code which defines a bed and breakfast inn as an "owner-occupied" "single-family dwelling unit." Elenes v. Deschutes County, 78 Or LUBA 483 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county hearings officer errs in denying a forest template dwelling application on the sole basis that petitioner had not provided a fire safety inspection, where the applicable ordinance provision entitled "Wildfire Safety Requirements" requires "[o]ther measures as recommended by the fire agency commenting on the application or the County Fire Safety Inspector," and no fire agency recommended any measures or a fire inspection in any submitted comments. Blu Dutch LLC v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 495 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Even though an applicant provides evidence of ownership of 200 or more acres in western Oregon after the application is deemed complete, a hearings officer correctly concludes that an application for a forest template dwelling satisfies ORS 215.740(3), where nothing in the statute or local development ordinances requires an applicant for a large tract forest dwelling to prove ownership of the parcel at the time an application is submitted. Blu Dutch LLC v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 495 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer correctly interprets ORS 215.740(3) in concluding that the minimum acreage requirement that applies to an application for a forest template dwelling is the minimum acreage for the applicant's tracts located in western Oregon where the forest template dwelling is proposed to be located, rather than the non-contiguous parcel located in an adjacent county designated as eastern Oregon. ORS 215.740 allows an owner seeking a dwelling on a tract that is located in western Oregon to rely on non-contiguous land in another adjacent county to meet the minimum acreage requirements; it does not require that the minimum acreage requirements for the non-contiguous county be the applicable standard. Blu Dutch LLC v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 495 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Petitioner's argument that the county hearings officer's failure to adopt findings of compliance with a county code provision (Washington County Development Code (CDC 421-7.8)) is not a position presented "without probable cause" sufficient to entitle an award of attorney fees against a non-prevailing party, where LUBA agreed with petitioner that the hearings officer's failure to adopt any findings explicitly addressing CDC 421-7.8 would warrant remand, unless, as occurred here, other findings with respect to other standards (CDC 422) in the hearings officer's decision were sufficient to address the substantive standards set forth in CDC 421-7.8, and therefore the hearings officer's failure to adopt findings addressing CDC 421-7.8 was harmless error. McAndrew v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 1094 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. That different setbacks standards with different language are interpreted to require the same setback distance does not run afoul of the general interpretative requirement to give different effect to different words used in the same statute, where the local government shows that the different words nevertheless support requiring the same setback distance. Brannon v. Multnomah County, 77 Or LUBA 275 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The undefined standard categories "site-related development standards" and "use-related development standards" are ambiguous; a front setback standard and a maximum height standard could fall into either category. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a general category called "use-related development standards" is followed by a nonexclusive list of examples, and minimum front setback and maximum height standards are not included on the list, that is some support for concluding that minimum front setback and maximum height standards are not use-related development standards. But where one of the specified examples of a general category called "use-related development standards" is "size of use standards," it is certainly possible that a maximum height standard qualifies as a "size of use standard" and thus could qualify as a "use-related development standard." Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a hearings officer's findings provide an inadequate explanation for why he concluded minimum front setback and maximum building height standards qualify as "site-related development standards," that prior city hearings officers and the city council have reached the same conclusion is some support for the hearings officer's conclusion. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Although local legislative history is generally not subject to official notice by LUBA and cannot be considered on appeal if it is not included in the local record, where the legislative history is contemporary commentary that was adopted by the city council when it adopted the legislation, LUBA will consider the commentary. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a prior version of the zoning ordinance only allowed modifications for setback and height standards, and the zoning ordinance was amended to allow a general category of standards, that lends some support to the local government's position that the general category of standards includes setback and height standards. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Although LUBA may take official notice of commentary that was adopted with an ordinance, where that ordinance does not enact or amend the ambiguous zoning ordinance language at issue, it is of no significance in resolving the ambiguity. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer's findings cannot be faulted for failing to address the impacts of a modification (variance) on petitioner's nearby residence, where the findings expressly address those impacts and the relationship between the proposed structure and petitioner's residence and point out that the proposed structure is downslope and offset from petitioner's residence. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer's failure to adopt findings that address potential impacts of a proposed building on one nearby dwelling in granting a maximum height modification (variance) is not a basis for remand, where the "on balance" nature of the modification (variance) approval standard does not necessarily require individual findings for every nearby residence, a public walkway between that dwelling and the proposed dwelling reduces any legitimate expectation of privacy, and the topography and scale of the proposed building is such that where the two structures adjoin each other they will be of similar height. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Oregon Laws 2008, chapter 12, legislatively overruled the holding in Phillips v. Polk County, 53 Or LUBA 194, aff'd, 213 Or App 498, 162 P3d 338 (2007), which provided that it was unlawful to adjust property boundaries in a way that results in parcels that fail to comply with applicable minimum parcel sizes. Oregon Laws 2008, chapter 12, authorizes property line adjustments of substandard size lots and parcels, even if the resulting lots or parcels continue to fail to comply with applicable minimum parcel sizes. Oregon Laws 2008, chapter 12, section 6 made that legislation retroactive to "property line adjustments approved before, on or after the effective date of this 2008 Act." Therefore, Oregon Laws 2008, chapter 12 applies to a property line adjustment that took place in 2007, because the property line adjustment was "approved * * * before, on or after" the effective date of the 2008 Act. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 77 Or LUBA 486 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Petitioner fails to meet her burden to demonstrate that LUBA has subject matter jurisdiction over a city council's decision to remove 35 trees from a city park, where petitioner argues the decision constitutes "logging" because it was motivated at least in part to generate revenue, and "logging" is not authorized under the Public Open Space zone that applies to the park. Simply because a city decides to offset the costs of removing hazardous trees to avoid the cost of treating and maintaining other compromised trees that are not yet hazardous does not convert the tree removal proposal into a logging operation, or otherwise make the decision a "land use decision." Carlson v. City of Brookings, 77 Or LUBA 497 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Petitioner has not demonstrated that a city's decision to remove 35 trees from a 33-acre city park will have a significant qualitative or quantitative impact on present or future land uses. The decision does not alter any of the land uses allowed in the park's zone or any of the present or future land uses in the park, and the trees themselves are not land "uses" in any legally cognizable sense. Carlson v. City of Brookings, 77 Or LUBA 497 (2018).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will reject an argument that a legislative text amendment prohibiting new or expanded fossil fuel terminals is inconsistent with the Metro Framework Plan and Metro Transportation Plan where the city's code requires only that code text amendments are consistent with Metro's Urban Growth Management Functional Plan. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer errs in interpreting a condition of approval for a multi-phase planned unit development (PUD), which requires that the applicant for final phase approval submit a traffic stud y to determine if additional improvements are necessary to comply with the Transportation Planning Rule, to effectively supersede a different condition of approval applicable to all phases of the PUD that limits maximum development on the site to produce no more than a specified number of vehicle trips, where the two conditions can instead be interpreted to give effect to both. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 187 (2017).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county reasonably interprets its road vacation ordinance to apply to vacation of public easements, notwithstanding that the ordinance does not expressly refer to the vacation of public easements, where the ordinance implements ORS 368.326, a statute that authorizes counties to establish vacation procedures for, among other things, public easements. Neighbors for Smart Growth v. Washington County, 76 Or LUBA 319 (2017).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a comprehensive plan policy calls on the city to "[m]aintain the existing residential housing stock in established older neighborhoods by maintaining existing Comprehensive Plan and zoning designations where appropriate," and the city commission adopts a number of reasons why it believes maintaining existing planning and zoning designations is "not appropriate," a petitioner must do more than set out reasons why he thinks maintaining the existing planning and zoning is appropriate without directly challenging the city commission's reasoning. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a comprehensive plan policy requires that a city "ensure that potential loss of affordable housing is replaced" when changing comprehensive plan and zoning map designations, city findings that city-wide efforts to encourage affordable housing will be sufficient to make up for the loss of five dwellings through construction of a medical center made possible under new comprehensive plan and zoning map designations are sufficient to demonstrate the policy will not be violated. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A comprehensive plan goal of "protecting and maintaining neighborhoods" is not necessarily violated by a development that will displace five existing houses. A city commission interpretation that the proposal complies with the goal, notwithstanding the loss of the five houses, so lo ng as the proposal will otherwise protect and maintain the nearby neighborhood, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the zoning code does not define "hospital structures" but does separately list "Hospitals" and "Medical and dental clinics, outpatient; [and] infirmary services" as permitted uses, a city does not misconstrue the zoning code by concluding that a "medical office building "does not qualify as a "hospital" and therefore need not have a backup source of electricity, which hospitals are required to have under the zoning code. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 475B.340(2) and ORS 475.500(2) allow local governments to adopt "reasonable regulations" on marijuana production, processing, and sales. A county zoning ordinance that prohibits marijuana production in a rural residential zone while al lowing marijuana production in an exclusive farm use zone and on lands zoned farm and forest, which together include more than one million acres in the county, is a "reasonable regulation" within the meaning of the statutes. Diesel v. Jackson County, 74 Or LUBA 286 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation of a code provision that prohibits the filing of an application within two years that is "substantially similar" to an application that the county denied as requiring a high degree of similarity. Under the rules of interpretation, LUBA will affirm the hearings officer's conclusion that an application to develop a 62-lot subdivision on land zoned R 10 is not substantially similar to a previously denied application to develop a 72-lot subdivision on land zoned R 10, where the new subdivision proposes approximately 15 percent fewer lots, an increase in average lot size of approximately 20 percent, a decrease of approximately 100 daily trips, an increase in on-street parking, and wider streets. Reinert v. Clackamas County, 74 Or LUBA 427 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation of a code provision that requires the county to (1) incorporate tree preservation into a development plan "wherever feasible," and (2) balance the preservation of natural features with the needs of development provided such balancing shall not require a reduction in the number of lots or dwelling units that would otherwise be permitted, to not require additional trees beyond the 90 of 423 that were proposed to be preserved where preservation of the additional trees would require a reduction in the number of lots or dwelling units that would otherwise be permitted. Reinert v. Clackamas County, 74 Or LUBA 427 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where an assignment of error challenges an interpretation that the decision on appeal does not adopt, the assignment of error does not establish a basis for reversal or remand. Fernandez v. City of Portland, 73 Or LUBA 107 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In some circumstances a local government may have to provide some interpretation or findings explaining its understanding of a subjective standard such as a requirement to adopt buffers that "ensure compatibility" between urban and rural agricultural uses. However, in the context of a legislative proceeding to adopt regulations for such buffers there is no inherent obligation to adopt an interpretation of the standard, and the failure to adopt an interpretation is not in itself a basis for reversal or remand. Forest Park Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 73 Or LUBA 193 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where one of seven factors that the comprehensive plan describes as "guid[ing] the determination of the most appropriate zone" guides the county to consider "[a]vailability of transit" and provides that "land within walking distance (approximately one-quarter mile) of a transit stop should be zoned for smaller lots," a hearings officer errs in concluding that land within approximately one-quarter mile of a transit stop is not within "walking distance" because sidewalks are not present. Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the comprehensive plan sets out seven factors that "guide the determination of the most appropriate zone," a hearings officer errs in weighing some of the factors as less important than other factors without any support for that weighting in the express language of the factors or other parts of the comprehensive plan. Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where one of seven factors that the comprehensive plan describes as "guid[ing] the determination of the most appropriate zone" guides the county to consider "proximity to jobs, shopping, and cultural activities" and guides that areas in proximity to jobs, shopping and cultural activities should be considered for smaller lots, a hearings officer errs in concluding that land that is proximate to jobs and shopping should not be zoned for smaller lots based on the hearings officer's negative assumptions about the quality of the jobs and shopping. Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where one of seven factors that the comprehensive plan describes as "guid[ing] the determination of the most appropriate zone" guides that areas that have historically developed on large lots should "remain zoned consistent with the existing development pattern, "and the hearings officer interprets the "existing development pattern" to be synonymous with the existing zoning, remand is required in order for the hearings officer to explain why a change from 10,000-square-foot lots to 8,500-square-foot lots in an area with some 8,500-square-foot lots is not "consistent with the existing development pattern." Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the comprehensive plan sets out seven factors that "guide the determination of the most appropriate zone," and the factors are not competing policies and do not work at cross purposes, a hearings officer errs in weighting some of the factors as less important than other factors without any support for that weighting in the express language of the factors or other parts of the comprehensive plan. Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer correctly interprets the provisions of the comprehensive plan's Housing chapter as not applying to an application for a zone change because a residential zone change proposes only a change in the zoning and possible density of housing but does not propose a particular type of housing. Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer correctly interprets the provisions of the comprehensive plan's Public Facilities and Services chapter as not applying to an application for a zone change, where the chapter's policies are directed at development, and the adopted land use regulations implement the policies and apply at the time of development. Lennar Northwest, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 240 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county finding that wind turbines are a conditional use in a commercial zone is not reversible error, even though wind turbines are not listed as a conditional use in the zone, where the balance of the decision clearly demonstrates the county in fact utilized its authority to approve uses that are similar to listed permitted and conditional uses in the zone to approve the wind turbines. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where LUBA sustains three assignments of error, but denies a fourth assignment of error, rejecting petitioner's challenge to a county commissioners' interpretation that a permit expiration standard that requires a finding that the applicant is not at fault for failing to complete the use authorized by the permit is met because the county's multi-stage destination resort process is so complicated, and LUBA's decision is reversed on appeal, with the Court of Appeals concluding that making the complexity of the multi-stage resort process the only consideration in applying the standard is an implausible interpretation of the standard, LUBA will sustain the fourth assignment of error as well. Gould v. Deschutes County, 72 Or LUBA 258 (2015).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer is not required to interpret and apply a county code provision that is similar, but not identical, to a different county code provision that was at issue in a thirteen-year-old board of county commissioner's decision that applied to a different application and property in the same way that the board of commissioners previously applied the different code provision. Head v. Lane County, 72 Or LUBA 411 (2015).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the word "property" is not defined in the local code, the county correctly considers context provided by the definitions of "property line adjustment" and "property line," both of which include reference to a "lot of record," in order to interpret the meaning of "property" to refer generally to whatever units of land (parcel, lot, or lot of record) that are subject to a property line adjustment. LaBare v. Clackamas County, 71 Or LUBA 25 (2015).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under ORS 197.829(2), LUBA is authorized to interpret county land use regulations in the first instance in cases where the local government has failed to do so. Where a party raises an argument that a building used to board horses is authorized as a permitted use under the zoning and development ordinance, and the hearings officer does not consider the argument and does not adopt findings in response to the party's argument, LUBA may interpret the zoning ordinance and determine whether the building used to board horses is a permitted or conditional use in the zone. Stavrum v. Clackamas County, 71 Or LUBA 290 (2015).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city's code does not expressly provide that the city's decisions are "final" for purposes of appeal to LUBA on the date notice is mailed to the parties, but a city code provision directs the planning director to include a statement in the notice of decision that the decision is final and may be appealed to LUBA within 21 days of the date of mailing, LUBA will interpret the code provision as intended to make the city's decisions final on the date of mailing for purposes of OAR 661-010-0010(3), which authorizes local governments to determine the date of finality by local rule or ordinance. Stevens v. City of Island City, 71 Or LUBA 373 (2015).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer correctly concludes that an isolated wetland is not a "riparian corridor," where the code defines riparian corridor as "an area, adjacent to a water area," and the isolated wetland is not "adjacent to a water area." Carver v. Washington County, 70 Or LUBA 23 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the Court of Appeals interpreted similar operative language in a county's code to determine that "riparian zones" are areas adjacent to water areas designated in a community plan, a hearings officer correctly interprets the term "riparian corridor" in that code to apply only to riparian areas that are proximate to designated water areas. Carver v. Washington County, 70 Or LUBA 23 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code provision authorizing a private street if the street is "not needed to provide access to other properties in the area" is not violated by a required pedestrian/bicycle connection between the proposed private street and offsite transit facilities, because "other properties in the area" does not refer to transit facilities in a public right-of-way. Carver v. Washington County, 70 Or LUBA 23 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer's approval of an extension of a PUD construction schedule that has been modified several times since the original PUD approval is consistent with a code section governing extensions of PUDs, where nothing in the original PUD approval or a condition of approval requiring the parties to enter into a Performance Agreement detailing the construction schedule prohibits extending the construction schedule. Goodpasture Partners LLC v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 59 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A later-enacted section of the city's development code governing PUD modifications that includes similar provisions to a prior superseded version of the development code is the "corresponding provision" of the superseded code for purposes of the new code provision applicable to PUD modifications. Goodpasture Partners LLC v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 59 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Generally use of the same phrase in different provisions of the same statute indicates that the phrase has the same meaning. Because ORS 197.772(1) uses the term "property owner" to refer to the property owner at the time that the property is designated a historic resource, the use of the same term in ORS 197.772(3), which allows a property owner to request removal of the designation, suggests that "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) refers to the owner at the time of designation, not subsequent purchasers of the property. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Notwithstanding that ORS 197.772(1) and (3) both use the same phrase "property owner," the two sub-sections operate in entirely different, non-overlapping circumstances, which suggests that "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) may not be limited by context, as is ORS 197.772(1), to the property owner at the time property is designated a historic resource. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where legislative history of ORS 197.772(3) indicates that the legislators proposing that section believed the phrase "property owner" as used in that provision referred only to the property owner at the time property was designated for historic resource, and did not include subsequent purchasers, and an amendment intended to specify that "property owner" also included subsequent purchasers was later deleted in conference, the strongest inference is that the legislature intended "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) to include only the property owner at the time of designation, and not subsequent purchasers. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where legislative history of ORS 197.772(3) indicates that legislators intended to offer remedial relief to property owners who were "coerced" into having their property designated as a historic resource, but the legislative history does not indicate that the legislature was equally concerned with subsequent purchasers who acquire the property knowing it is designated as a historic resource, that legislative history supports the conclusion that "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) is limited to owners at the time the property was designated, not subsequent purchasers. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer correctly rejects an interpretation that connecting two dwellings by a causeway creates a single "dwelling," with two or more "dwelling units," based on a general code definition of "dwelling," where a narrower definition of dwelling that limits "dwelling" to a single dwelling unit applies in the zone. Macfarlane v. Clackamas County, 70 Or LUBA 126 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a planning commission's interpretation of a code net density calculation requirement to exclude "public and private streets and alleys, public parks, and other public facilities "as not requiring the exclusion of acreage that is encumbered by easements for sewer and water lines where the phrase "other public facilities" is not defined and the applicable code provision does not use the word "easement." Oakleigh-McClure Neighbors v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 132 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A planning commission improperly construes a requirement in the local code to adequately screen a proposed PUD from adjacent properties when it concludes that existing open space provides adequate screening, where it does not require the PUD to be visually shielded or obscured from the adjacent property through any of the means specified in the definition, because it fails to give meaning to the word "screening." Oakleigh-McClure Neighbors v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 132 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Legislative Counsel's decision to renumber as ORS 215.284(1) to (6) what the legislature enacted as ORS 215.283(3) to (8) does not change the fact that what is now codified at ORS 215.284(1) to (6) was enacted by the legislature as part of ORS 215.283 and 215.283. ORS 215.283 is the statutory regime that applies to non-marginal lands counties rather than marginal lands counties. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 70 Or LUBA 325 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation of provisions of the city's development code and the city's utility licensing code section that apply to wireless communications facilities to exempt a wireless communication facility tower (WCF Tower) that is proposed to be located in the public right-of-way, where all of the applicable provisions, read together, support a conclusion that the city intended to exempt WCF towers located in the public right-of-way from special use review under the city's development code. Weston Kia v. City of Gresham, 70 Or LUBA 483 (2014).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a decision maker identifies the dictionaries relied on to clarify the meaning of ambiguous terms, it is not error to fail to identify which edition of those dictionaries was used where the dictionary definitions are generally consistent with the definitions of those terms in the 2002 unabridged edition of Webster's Third New Int'l Dictionary. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. It is not error to consult dictionary definitions of the component terms of a larger complete term, where the larger complete term is not defined by local land use code that uses the larger complete term. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where it can be established that a local government intended a technical or industry-based meaning for an ambiguous term, it is error to instead rely on general dictionary definitions. However, it is not error to rely on general dictionary definitions where the record does not establish a technical or industry-based meaning was intended. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where there is nothing in the record to suggest the enacting city council understood the separate steps in metals recycling or the industry understanding of the scope of activities in scrap and recycling facilities, there is no reason to believe the enacting local government's understanding of the scope of "scrap and dismantling yard" was influenced by the industry's understanding of the meaning of that term. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where there is no reason to believe the enacting governing body was aware of or considered statutes and rules governing dismantling of scrap metal processing yards when it enacted the local term "scrap and dismantling yard," the fact that those statutes and rules exclude metal shredders is not context for determining whether the local term "scrap and dismantling yard" includes metal shredders. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the city zoning listing of permitted uses includes "scrap and dismantling yard," and the zoning ordinance provides that "'or' may be read as 'and' and 'and' may be read as 'or,' if the sense requires it," it is questionable whether the permitted use must both accept scrap and engage in dismantling. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the record is such that a reasonable decision maker could have concluded that a metal shredder is a sufficiently unique step in metals recycling that it should be viewed as different in kind and therefore a different use from a "scrap and dismantling yard," but the record and dictionary definitions also would permit a reasonable decision maker to view a metal shredder as simply a different piece of equipment to allow more complete recycling, LUBA will conclude that the local decision maker did not "[i]mproperly construe the applicable law" in adopting the latter view. Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where some zoning ordinances take a "laundry list" approach and include an exhaustive list of allowed uses and other zoning ordinances list more generally allowed categories of uses, followed by a non-exclusive listing of examples, it may be more appropriate to narrowly construe uses listed in zoning ordinances taking the former approach and more broadly construe uses listed in zoning ordinances taking the latter approach. But where a zoning ordinance is not easily categorized into either approach, and includes elements of both, a local decision maker does not err by failing to adopt a narrow construction of the term "scrap and dismantling yard." Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 193 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code definition of "lot" as an "area of land owned by or under the lawful control and in the lawful possession of one distinct ownership" does not have the legal effect of aggregating adjacent, separately owned areas of land. Mackenzie v. Multnomah County, 68 Or LUBA 327 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm as correct a hearings officer's interpretation that a local code provision that requires aggregation of contiguous parcels in common ownership for development of a "Lot of Record" in a particular zoning district is not self-effecting. Such a code provision does not have the effect of aggregating contiguous parcels in common ownership merely because the parcels were, for three years, included in the particular zoning district, where no development was proposed or completed during the three-year period when the property was included in the zoning district. Mackenzie v. Multnomah County, 68 Or LUBA 327 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm as correct a hearings officer's conclusion that a prior dwelling approval for one property did not aggregate adjacent contiguous parcels in common ownership, where nothing in the local code criteria that applied to the prior dwelling approval required aggregation in order to obtain a development permit, and the dwelling approval was not conditioned on aggregation of the parcels. Mackenzie v. Multnomah County, 68 Or LUBA 327 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the language of a development code is such that it anticipates an application for declaratory ruling will be submitted by a single owner of a single property, the development code is therefore ambiguous regarding whether an application for a declaratory ruling is possible when the application concerns more than one property and is ambiguous regarding whether the application must be signed by all property owners or may be signed by any property owner. Gould v. Deschutes County, 67 Or LUBA 1 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where competing interpretations of a development code are equally plausible, and there is some contextual support for the interpretation selected by a hearings officer, LUBA will conclude that the hearings officer did not "[i]mproperly construe[] the applicable law," within the meaning of ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D). Gould v. Deschutes County, 67 Or LUBA 1 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government errs in construing a previous decision that deferred finding compliance with an applicable approval criterion to final planned unit development stage to restrict the local government's obligation to determine whether the applicable criterion that was deferred is satisfied by only considering whether the information required by a condition of approval was submitted, where the previous decision makes clear that the local government completely deferred making a determination of compliance with the applicable criterion to the final PUD stage. Willamette Oaks, LLC v. City of Eugene, 67 Or LUBA 33 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will not consider whether a county has authority to approve conditional zoning where the applicant modified its proposal making conditional zoning unnecessary before the board of commissioners could make a decision about whether the county had such authority. Warren v. Josephine County, 67 Or LUBA 74 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a planning commission's conclusion that ponds and a slough area were included within the city's Willamette River Greenway boundary for their important natural values, and not because the area is a "channel" of the Willamette River, where the city's adopted greenway boundary map and a study the city relied on in setting the boundaries support the city's conclusion. Willamette Oaks, LLC v. City of Eugene, 67 Or LUBA 351 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the county zoning that applied to recently annexed territory inside a city's urban growth boundary provided that dwellings were allowed only if the property "was designated for residential use by the city," and the city took the position in its brief that the property was not designated for residential use, LUBA will assume that the city is correct where (1) petitioners do not argue in their petition for review that property was designated for residential use and (2) petitioners fail to respond to the city's argument in its brief. Knaupp v. City of Forest Grove, 67 Or LUBA 398 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will not interpret a statute differently than the Court of Appeals interpreted the statute, based on legislative history that the Court of Appeals may not have considered, where LUBA cannot determine from the Court of Appeals' decision whether it declined to consider the legislative history under PGE v. Bureau of Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 610-12, 859 P2d 1143 (1993), because it found the statutory meaning was resolved by examining the text and context, or whether the Court of Appeals simply found the legislative history unpersuasive or not sufficient to overcome the text and context. Roads End Water District v. City of Lincoln City, 67 Or LUBA 452 (2013).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a city decision that an applicant's methodology for estimating trip generation from a proposed discount superstore is consistent with the guidelines set out in an applicable traffic generation manual, where nothing in the manual requires that another method be used where no similarly situated store is located in the city, or calls into question the extrapolation method that the traffic engineer used. Neighbors for Dallas v. City of Dallas, 66 Or LUBA 36 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a city council's interpretation of local code provisions governing when a traffic impact analysis (TIA) is required for a land use application that concludes that a TIA is not required where ODOT is the road authority with jurisdiction over the affected roads, and petitioners merely disagree with the city's interpretation but do not explain why the interpretation is not plausible. Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 259, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Neighbors for Dallas v. City of Dallas, 66 Or LUBA 36 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A one-half-acre size requirement threshold for requiring PUD approval is not a mere application requirement that can be overlooked to require PUD approval for proposals of less than one-half acre. Even if the city intended to delete that threshold for PUD proposals near transit stations, where the threshold clearly applies it cannot be overlooked to give effect to an intent that is inconsistent with the text of the zoning ordinance. Mintz v. City of Beaverton, 66 Or LUBA 118 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A petitioner fails to establish that a city erroneously interpreted a county "ten percent/10,000 square foot" limitation on commercial development in a mixed-use zone to apply to individual development proposals rather than the larger comprehensive plan areas when a large number of small developments might be proposed where there is textual support f or both the city's and petitioner's interpretation. Mintz v. City of Beaverton, 66 Or LUBA 118 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Unless presented with some evidence to the contrary, a city decision maker could reasonably assume that proposed residential development will generate negligible air and noise pollution. Rosenzweig v. City of McMinnville, 66 Or LUBA 164 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the issue in an appeal of a decision authorizing expansions to a winery under the ORS 215.283(2)(a) authority for "commercial activities that are in conjunction with farm use" is whether that expansion exceeds the judicially created requirement that such winery activities must be incidental and secondary activities that are supportive of vineyards, the legislature's treatment of wineries in different subsequently enacted statutes that specifically authorize wineries in EFU zones is relevant, even though those subsequently enacted statutes are not part of the statutory context of ORS 215.283(2)(a). Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 66 Or LUBA 212 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In resolving ambiguities in the text of an ordinance that amends a local government's zoning ordinance, the title of the amending ordinance may be considered. Cassidy v. City of Glendale, 66 Or LUBA 314 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under State v. Gaines, 346 Or 160, 171-72, 206 P3d 1042 (2009), LUBA is free to consider any legislative history it considers useful and where the available legislative history is completely consistent with the city's interpretation and completely inconsistent with petitioner's interpretation, the legislative history is useful in resolving the different interpretations. Cassidy v. City of Glendale, 66 Or LUBA 314 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Before it is appropriate to consider the non-regulatory ESEE Consequences Determination portion of Goal 5 planning for a site as context for interpreting the regulatory Resource Protection Program there must first be an ambiguity in the Resource Protection Program. Mark Latham Excavation Inc. v. Deschutes County, 65 Or LUBA 32 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Text of an acknowledged Resource Protection Program may be unambiguous when read in isolation but may be ambiguous when read in context with the ESEE Consequences Determination. Mark Latham Excavation Inc. v. Deschutes County, 65 Or LUBA 32 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Representations by a former owner that it only intended to mine 25 acres of an 80-acre site are insufficient legislative history to establish that the acknowledged Resource Protection Program for the site limits mining to 25 acres, where the programs for other sites expressly limited mining geographically but the program for the 80-acre site zoned all 80 acres for mining and imposed no express geographical limits. Mark Latham Excavation Inc. v. Deschutes County, 65 Or LUBA 32 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will remand a decision where the findings are inadequate to explain why a hearings officer interprets setback provisions that require a 100-foot setback to apply only to a proposed new kennel building and to not apply to outdoor dog play areas. Butcher v. Washington County, 65 Or LUBA 263 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a zoning ordinance would allow a VA outpatient clinic use as "Government Services" uses only if the use is not "specifically listed" uses in other zoning districts, and the zoning ordinance authorizes "Medical Health Facilities" in other zoning districts, the critical question is whether authorizing "Medical Health Facilities" in those other zones is sufficient to "specifically list" the proposed VA outpatient clinic use. In resolving that question, the maxim of statutory construction in ORS 174.020 that calls for selection of a particular provision over a more general provision where they conflict is of no particular assistance. Randazzo v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 272 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Whether a city council initially tries to reverse a hearings official's interpretation of the city zoning code by amending the zoning code has no bearing on whether the city council could also effectively reverse the hearings official's interpretation by adopting an interpretation of its own. Randazzo v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 272 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the applicable approval criteria require an applicant to demonstrate that noise from its operations will not create a significant health or safety risk to nearby uses, and the evidence in the record shows that noise from its operations will satisfy the ongoing operating standard, LUBA will reject an argument that the applicable approval criteria require the applicant to demonstrate that total noise from all noise sources in the area will satisfy the applicable criteria. Cottonwood Capital Property Mgmt. LLC v. City of Portland, 65 Or LUBA 370 (2012).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In interpreting a zoning standard that requires a permit applicant to "[i]nsure that natural features of the landscape, such as land forms, natural drainageways, trees and wooded areas, are preserved as much as possible and protected during construction," the doctrine of the last antecedent would suggest that the obligation that natural features be "preserved as much as possible and protected" is not limited to the period of "construction." Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The terms "commercial use" and "industrial use" are plainly general categories of uses that include more than one individual member. Where the zoning code defines "industrial use" to include the use of land for "processing primary, secondary, or recycled materials into a product, "that definition is sufficiently broad to include a proposed aggregate mine where the application states that "[e]xtracted material will be processed through a crusher to make the aggregate product desired." Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a zoning code expressly states that "a dimensional or development standard" set out in a latter part of the zoning ordinance applies in place of standards in an earlier part of the zoning ordinance when the earlier and latter standards "differ," a hearings officer erroneously interprets the zoning ordinance in concluding that the latter standards wholly displace the earlier standards without first establishing that they "differ." Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A 1996 special siting statute for light rail projects specifically authorizes highway improvements and therefore may be used to site a light rail extension that includes substantial highway bridge and freeway improvements. Weber Coastal Bells v. Metro, 64 Or LUBA 221 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. It is not error to rely in part on compensation at fair market value when property must be condemned and relocation assistance for displaced businesses, as mitigation, when siting a regional light rail facility under a special siting statute. Weber Coastal Bells v. Metro, 64 Or LUBA 221 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a zoning ordinance requires that a notice of local appeal "include" "a clear and distinct identification of the specific grounds" for appeal and that compliance with that requirement is "jurisdictional," a local government may insist on strict compliance with the zoning ordinance requirements of a local notice of appeal. It is not inconsistent with the text of the zoning ordinance to conclude that a local appeal should be dismissed where the notice of intent to appeal includes no grounds for appeal and instead attempts to incorporate by reference legal issues stated in a different document that was created for a different reason, without attaching a copy of that document. Lang v. City of Ashland, 64 Or LUBA 250 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city zoning ordinance delegates authority to a hearings official to "interpret" the zoning ordinance, the hearings official does not err by interpreting that delegation not to authorize the hearings official to declare city land use legislation ineffective to achieve the purpose it was clearly adopted to accomplish. Such a request is not a request for an "interpretation." Goodpasture Partners LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 258 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city zoning ordinance delegates authority to a hearings official to "interpret" the zoning ordinance, without expressly limiting such interpretations to ambiguous zoning text, that delegation nevertheless does not authorize the hearings official to interpret unambiguous zoning text to say what it does not say. Goodpasture Partners LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 258 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city council's interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy that requires adequate off-street parking is fully implemented by code off-street parking standards is plausible and LUBA will affirm the interpretation. Rosenzweig v. City of McMinnville, 64 Or LUBA 402 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In conducting the alternatives analysis required under the local code for a proposal to develop access to a property over an unimproved right-of-way in an environmentally sensitive zone, a hearings officer correctly limits the alternatives analysis required under the local code to those alternatives that provide access to the location of the approved home site on the subject property, and correctly rejects alternatives that provide access to potential home sites in different locations on the property that have not received county approval. Mackenzie v. City of Portland, 63 Or LUBA 148 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under DEQ's noise regulations a wind energy generation facility may add 10 decibels to the background ambient noise level. In determining whether the facility violates that noise standard the operator may assume that the background ambient noise level is 26 decibels or actually measure the background ambient noise level and the operator's selection of the assumed 26 decibel background ambient noise level at one measuring location and time does not preclude the operator from selecting actual measured background ambient noise level at other measurement locations and times. Mingo v. Morrow County, 63 Or LUBA 357 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under Flying J. Inc. v. Marion County, 49 Or LUBA 28, 36-37, aff'd, 201 Or App 99, 117 P3d 1027 (2005), where the text of an ordinance that adopts zoning designation amendments expresses a clear intent that the prior zoning for a parcel be retained but the map attached to the ordinance shows a change in zoning, that conflict is resolved in favor of the text. Turner v. Jackson County, 62 Or LUBA 199 (2010).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where one sentence of a zoning ordinance provides that "any dispute" concerning the zoning of property is to be resolved by reference to the official zoning map, but that sentence appears immediately after a sentence that states that initial zoning boundary determinations are to be made based on maps generated by the local government's GIS system, those sentences should be read together to require that any disputes that arise based on the GIS maps or facts that arise after the zoning ordinance was adopted be resolved in favor of the official zoning map. But those sentences of the zoning ordinance do not require that a text/map conflict in the enacting zoning ordinance itself be resolved in favor of the official zoning map, where it is clear the new zoning shown for a property on the official zoning map was a mistake, and the text of the enacting ordinance clearly states that the zoning of the property was not changed by the ordinance. Turner v. Jackson County, 62 Or LUBA 199 (2010).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. An interpretation of a city landslide hazard regulation that gives no effect to the main clause of the regulation and only gives effect to the subordinate clause arguably runs afoul of the interpretive principle embodied in ORS

174.010, which prohibits interpreting statutes in a way that omits statutory language that has been included in the statute. Gravatt v. City of Portland, 62 Or LUBA 382 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the Goal 4 rule incorporates a definition in the Oregon Structural Specialty Code, the version of the Code in effect when the Goal 4 rule was adopted controls, not the Code as subsequently amended, to avoid running afoul of constitutional prohibitions on delegating legislative authority. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Jefferson County, 62 Or LUBA 443 (2011).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where one section of a zoning ordinance permits the city engineer to approve more than one driveway access to lots and parcels "subject to access requirements," and another section of the zoning ordinance setting out the city's access requirements generally prohibits direct access to arterials where a lot or parcel already has access to a lower category roadway, a city correctly denies the request for the direct arterial access. In that case the two sections of the zoning ordinance do not conflict; the contingent authority to grant more than one driveway is simply limited by the section setting out access requirements. Athletic Club of Bend, Inc. v. City of Bend, 61 Or LUBA 349 (2010).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government's interpretation of its ordinance is not "inconsistent" with the language of the ordinance, within the meaning of ORS 197.829(1)(a), if the interpretation is plausible, given the interpretive principles that ordinarily apply to the construction of ordinances under the rules of PGE v. Bureau of Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 859 P2d 1143 (1993). Scovel v. City of Astoria, 60 Or LUBA 371 (2010).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In determining whether a local government's interpretation of local land use law is inconsistent with the "express language" of the local land use law, LUBA and the appellate courts apply the statutory construction principles in ORS 174.010, which preclude interpretations that insert or delete words. Scovel v. City of Astoria, 60 Or LUBA 371 (2010).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government's interpretation of its own land use laws to allow the planning commission complete discretion to grant an unlimited number of one-year permit approval extensions will not be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1), where the local government's interpretation adds language that is not present in the local land use law, and the interpretation defeats the purpose of the local land use law, which is to limit the life of a permit decision that is not acted on. Scovel v. City of Astoria, 60 Or LUBA 371 (2010).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Land use regulations that simply require that permit applications comply with "applicable" provisions in the land use regulations are frequently ambiguous, since they require an unguided review of the land use regulations to determine which provisions are "applicable." Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The applicability of a local government's land use regulations, viewed in isolation, may be unambiguous. However, when those same land use regulations are viewed in context with others parts of the local government's land use regulations, the applicability of those land use regulations may be qualified or limited. Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government misinterprets an ordinance that implements the OAR 660-023-0090(8) safe harbor provision that allows alterations to occupy up to 50 percent of the "width" of certain riparian corridors to mean alterations that take up less than 50 percent of the entire riparian area are permitted. The proper interpretation is that alterations may only occur within the 50 percent of the riparian corridor farthest from the river. ODFW v. Josephine County, 59 Or LUBA 174 (2009).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a code provision prohibits development approval for property that is not in full compliance with all code requirements and prior approvals, unless the approval results in the property coming into full compliance, a hearings officer does not err in interpreting the code to require the applicant to apply for all permits and approvals necessary to correct all code or permit violations as part of the development application, and to reject as insufficient the applicant's willingness to seek future permit approvals. Reeder v. Multnomah County, 59 Or LUBA 240 (2009).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A street connectivity standard that requires that development must "include street connections to any streets that abut, are adjacent to, or terminate at the development site" is not correctly interpreted to allow a development proposal that would extend an abutting street a short distance into the development and then terminate the street without connecting it to an adjoining street. Konrady v. City of Eugene, 59 Or LUBA 466 (2009).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings official does not err by finding that a street connectivity standard that requires that development street systems not create "excessive travel lengths" is violated by a subdivision proposal that will result in eleven existing residents and the residents of three of the proposed lots having to drive one quarter of a mile out of direction to make certain trips. While the hearings official likely could have adopted a more permissive reading of the standard, it was not error to adopt the strict interpretation that the hearings official adopted. Konrady v. City of Eugene, 59 Or LUBA 466 (2009).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will remand a decision determining that a conditional use is inconsistent with one of seven purposes of the underlying zone, where it is not clear whether the county must address each of the seven purposes and determine whether the proposed use is, on balance consistent with those purposes, or whether inconsistency with a single zone purpose is sufficient to deny the application, and the county's decision does not address the issue. Davis v. Polk County, 58 Or LUBA 1 (2008).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government does not misconstrue its ordinance when it interprets the term "contiguous" to mean lands adjacent to and within 2000 feet of the subject property. Hermanson v. Lane County, 56 Or LUBA 433 (2008).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government does not err in determining that a holder of an option to purchase property is not an "owner" for purposes of the local code definition of owner where the definition restricts owners to legal title holders or entities purchasing property under a written contract. Vilks v. Jackson County, 56 Or LUBA 451 (2008).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A code provision allowing a "property owner" to request a declaratory ruling related "to the use of the owner's property" does not permit a neighborhood association to request a declaratory ruling related to the use of property that the association does not own. Cushman v. City of Bend, 55 Or LUBA 234 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Remand is necessary where entitlement to initiate a declaratory ruling request rests on whether the applicant is the "permit holder," use of the subject property was arguably authorized by a number of different permits, and the hearings officer rejected a neighborhood's association's claim to be a "permit holder" without determining which permits are at issue and which persons hold those permits. Cushman v. City of Bend, 55 Or LUBA 234 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Interpretations of a local code provision offered for the first time in a response brief at LUBA are not interpretations made by the local government. Munkhoff v. City of Cascade Locks, 54 Or LUBA 660 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under Maxwell v. Lane County, 178 Or App 210, 35 P3d 1128 (2001), adh'd to as modified, 179 Or App 409, 40 P3d 532 (2002), if directly applicable legislation expressly requires that an analysis of existing lots or parcels must be limited to an analysis of legally created lots or parcels, then it follows that only lawfully created lots or parcels can be considered. However, even if the directly applicable legislation does not expressly require that lots or parcels have been legally created, that requirement may be found in related enactments and the legislative context in which the directly applicable legislation appears. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 53 Or LUBA 4 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When the local code requires a comparison to densities suggested in the comprehensive plan but the decision does not address any suggested densities, remand is necessary to determine if the comprehensive plan includes any suggested densities and, if so, either address them or explain why they need not be addressed. Coquille Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Coquille, 53 Or LUBA 186 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When a code provision regarding riparian corridors could plausibly be required to be satisfied at the stage of the challenged decision or at a later stage, the issue was raised below, and the decision does not address the issue, the decision must be remanded for the local government to address the issue. Coquille Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Coquille, 53 Or LUBA 186 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When a local government imposes a condition of approval based on a code provision regarding excessive demand created by a proposed development, but the local government does not find that the proposed development will cause excessive demand, ignores the developer's proposed interpretation of excessive demand, and does not provide its own interpretation, the decision must be remanded. PacWest II, Inc. v. City of Madras, 53 Or LUBA 241 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the text of a city's development code only requires that the city not provide certain services in the absence of an annexation agreement, the city's interpretation of its code to allow it to require an annexation agreement at the time of partition approval, while not required by the text of the development code, is not inconsistent with the text of the development code. Wickham v. City of Grants Pass, 53 Or LUBA 261 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city's interpretation of a development code provision to allow it to require execution of an annexation agreement at the time of partition, rather than waiting until the property is developed, is consistent with contextual development code provisions that require annexation agreements at the time of partition approval without regard to whether development is proposed at the time of partition approval. Wickham v. City of Grants Pass, 53 Or LUBA 261 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county does not err by interpreting a development code approval criterion that requires that proposed uses must be shown to be compatible with surrounding uses to require consideration of only the existing surrounding uses and not potential future uses. Clark v. Coos County, 53 Or LUBA 325 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county does not err by interpreting a development code compatibility standard for the first time in its written decision, where the interpretation was not beyond the range of interpretations that could reasonably have been anticipated during the evidentiary phase of the county's proceedings, and petitioners do not demonstrate (1) that there is specific evidence that they could present that differs in substance from the evidence that they already submitted or (2) that the new evidence is directly responsive to the county's interpretation. Gutoski v. Lane County, 155 Or App 369, 963 P2d 145 (1998). Clark v. Coos County, 53 Or LUBA 325 (2007).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Even assuming a local government must evaluate the combined effect of multiple misstatements in the application that individually are immaterial, in determining whether to refer a revocation request to a hearing, where the alleged misstatements of fact have no relation to each other, there can be a "combined effect" to evaluate. Emami v. City of Lake Oswego, 52 Or LUBA 18 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county's interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy, which implements Statewide Planning Goal 18 (Beaches and Dunes) and provides criteria for a determination whether development is appropriate in a beaches and dunes area, requires the county to address only adverse geologic or geotechnical impacts and not general development issues, is consistent with the text and context of the policy and the goal. Borton v. Coos County, 52 Or LUBA 46 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county's interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy, which implements Statewide Planning Goal 7 (Natural Disasters and Hazards), requires regulation of development in known areas potentially subject to natural disasters and is aimed at reducing risks to life and property that are caused by natural hazards, is not applicable in the context of a determination whether development is appropriate in a beaches and dunes area, pursuant to a comprehensive plan policy that implements Statewide Planning Goal 18 (Beaches and Dunes), which is aimed at reducing impacts that may be caused by the proposed development. Borton v. Coos County, 52 Or LUBA 46 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county grading permit standard stating that grading activities "shall also occur pursuant to" the standards of the local sanitary sewer agency does not incorporate those standards into the code or require that the county determine whether the grading permit complies with the agency's standards. Angius v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 222 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where no county approval was required to create parcels of more than 20 acres in a transitional timber zone if the parcel was to be used for forest use and the question is whether a parcel that was created 16 years ago was created for forest use, the fact that the parcel was used only for growing trees for 16 years is sufficient to show the parcel was created for forest use and it does not matter that no trees were harvested during that 16-year period. Neal v. Clackamas County, 52 Or LUBA 248 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The broad statutory definition of "owner" under statutory lot-of-record provisions, which includes certain relatives of the fee title owner as the owner, does not apply in determining whether parcels are part of the same "tract" for purposes of approving a forest template dwelling. Neal v. Clackamas County, 52 Or LUBA 248 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. As a general rule there is no reason why a local government could not interpret an "orderly development" land division criterion to impose a more stringent standard than Oregon Department of Transportation's standard that the performance of failing intersections not be worsened by a proposal. However, where such an interpretation appears to be inconsistent with other city criteria and those apparent inconsistencies are not addressed in the decision maker's findings, LUBA will reject the interpretation as incorrect. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government's authority to interpret the scope and meaning of land use regulations adopted to implement statewide planning goals and administrative rules is constrained by ORS 197.829(1)(d), which requires LUBA to reverse an interpretation of a local regulation contrary to the goal, statute or rule it implements, notwithstanding the acknowledged status of that regulation. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 139 Or App 39, 911 P2d 250 (1996), LUBA may apply ORS 197.829(1)(d) to review a local government's interpretation of an acknowledged code provision that implements a statewide planning goal, statute or rule only if the code provision is ambiguous. If the code provision is subject to more than one reasonable interpretation, one of which is consistent with the goal, statute or rule implemented, the local government cannot choose an interpretation that is inconsistent with the goal, statute or rule implemented. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the local code fire siting standards require that secondary fuel breaks (i.e., a fuel break extending 130 feet in all directions around structures) "or their equivalent" apply to new residences, the county does not err in determining that secondary fuel breaks are not required in the riparian setback area, where the findings adopted in support of the riparian vegetation setback regulations acknowledge that riparian vegetation provides a sufficient natural barrier against the spread of fire. Lovinger v. Lane County, 51 Or LUBA 29 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The Oregon Laws 1987, chapter 737, section 3 standard requiring that property have "sewer and water lines paid for and installed by the property owner" is not correctly interpreted to require that the property have a "significant amount" of sewer and water lines paid for and installed by the property owner. Leupold & Stevens, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 51 Or LUBA 65 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The Oregon Laws 1987, chapter 737, section 3 standard requiring that property have "sewer and water lines paid for and installed by the property owner" is not correctly interpreted to require that the sewer and water lines also be installed off-site. Leupold & Stevens, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 51 Or LUBA 65 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Oregon Laws 1987, chapter 737, section 3 does not unambiguously provide that lateral sewer and water lines may qualify as "sewer and water lines paid for and installed by the property owner "and thus satisfy one of the law's requirements to qualify for protection from nonconsensual annexation. Therefore, resort to legislative history is appropriate. Leupold & Stevens, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 51 Or LUBA 65 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The Oregon Laws 1987, chapter 737, section 3 standard requiring that property have "sewer * * * lines paid for and installed by the property owner" is not satisfied where the property owner merely relocated sewer lines that were originally installed and paid for by a special district. Leupold & Stevens, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 51 Or LUBA 65 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the definition of "home occupation" in the local code includes a business activity that is conducted in a dwelling or accessory building normally associated with the primary uses allowed in the underlying zone, a local government need not determine whether the proposed business is normally associated with the permitted uses allowed in the zone. Watts v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 166 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the local noise standard applicable to home occupations provides that the proposed home occupation "shall not create noise that, when measured off the subject property, exceeds the greater of 60 dba or the ambient noise level," the hearings officer errs in interpreting that provision to allow noise spikes in excess of 60 dba. Watts v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 166 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local home occupation standard prohibits external evidence of a home occupation, an interpretation of that standard that allows a vehicle related to the home occupation to traverse the subject property to access an accessory structure in which the vehicle will be stored is reasonable. Watts v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 166 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where access from a county road to a home occupation is obtained via a driveway located on the pole portion of the subject property, the county does not err in determining that a local standard requiring that "the subject property have frontage on, and direct access from, a constructed public, county or state road" is satisfied, notwithstanding that the driveway crosses an existing easement providing access to neighboring properties. Watts v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 166 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When the approval criterion calls for a tree survey that "provides the location of all trees" of certain specifications, the local government may not use a one-acre sample to extrapolate for a 70-acre site without a showing that it is representative of the entire site. Butte Conservancy v. City of Gresham, 51 Or LUBA 194 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city is required by the Metro Code to prepare and release a report prior to annexation that describes how the annexation is consistent with agreements that the city is not a party to, but the Metro Code review criteria that govern review of the annexation on appeal do not require that the annexation be consistent with agreements the city is not a party to, Metro may not deny the annexation ordinance based on the city's failure to comply with the report requirement without explaining why that violation of the report requirements has the same status as a violation of one of the review criteria and provides a basis for denial. City of Damascus v. Metro, 51 Or LUBA 210 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Some caution is warranted in determining the intended scope of a term based on dictionary definitions, given the descriptive and all-inclusive nature of modern reference dictionaries. In many cases, the text and context of the code term may indicate that the governing body did not intend the term to encompass all possible dictionary meanings. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a variance criterion requires the city to find that "public need" outweighs "adverse impacts" of developing wetlands and a party argues there is no market demand for the commercial development that the variance would allow, the city must address in its findings the role, if any, that market demand plays under the variance criterion and explain why the public need, as the city interprets those words, outweighs the identified potential adverse impacts. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 51 Or LUBA 363 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The legislature's use of different terms to describe the actions required to have standing to appeal to LUBA is some indication that the legislature intended to impose different standing requirements. Century Properties, LLC v. City of Corvallis, 51 Or LUBA 572 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. To have standing to appeal a post-acknowledgment plan amendment under ORS 197.620(1) an appellant must have "participated" during the local proceedings, whereas to have standing to appeal under ORS 197.830(2) an appellant must have "appeared." The dictionary definitions of "participated" and "appeared" suggest more is required to participate than to appear, but those definitions do not identify what more is required. Century Properties, LLC v. City of Corvallis, 51 Or LUBA 572 (2006).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A comprehensive plan policy that merely describes the county's resource designations is not a mandatory tentative subdivision plan approval criterion, and the county was therefore not required to adopt findings addressing it. Doob v. Josephine County, 50 Or LUBA 209 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where "tract," "lot" and "parcel" are defined terms and a comprehensive plan policy uses the undefined term "ownership," a county decision that applies that policy as though "ownership" meant the same thing as "lot" or "parcel" but does not explain why must be remanded so that the county can explain its interpretation of the undefined term. Just v. Lane County, 50 Or LUBA 399 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A general code standard requiring streets to be improved with curbs and other facilities "if required" is not properly interpreted to require curbs for a private street, where the specific standards governing private streets do not require curbs. Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where an interpretation of an ambiguous code standard that bars variances in some circumstances is needed to explain why the local government believes that standard did not bar an approved variance, and the appealed decision does not include either an express or implied interpretation of the code standard, remand is required. Doyle v. Coos County, 49 Or LUBA 574 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Although LUBA is authorized to interpret ambiguous local land use legislation in the first instance if the local government fails to adopt a needed interpretation, where interpreting the land use legislation in a way that would be consistent with the local government's decision is problematic, LUBA will not attempt to interpret the legislation in the first instance. Doyle v. Coos County, 49 Or LUBA 574 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. If a local government wishes to interpret and apply traditional variance standards differently than those standards have traditionally been interpreted and applied, it must articulate an interpretation of those standards that is sufficient for review. Doyle v. Coos County, 49 Or LUBA 574 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government does not lose its inherent authority to interpret or reinterpret an ambiguous code provision in a quasi-judicial context when it decides to initiate a legislative code amendment process to resolve the code ambiguity. Bemis v. City of Ashland, 48 Or LUBA 42 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. While ORS 227.178(3), as interpreted in Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 154 Or App 450, 926 P2d 701 (1998), prohibits a local government from changing its position with respect to the applicability of approval standards during the proceedings on a permit application, neither the statute nor Holland prohibit a local government from reinterpreting the meaning of indisputably applicable approval standards. Bemis v. City of Ashland, 48 Or LUBA 42 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. References in contextual laws that the Metropolitan Service District is to work cooperatively and use non-mandatory approaches in requiring action by cities and counties do not provide much assistance in determining whether a statute that specifically authorizes the Metropolitan Service District to require that city and county comprehensive plans and land use regulations be amended authorizes Metro to mandate such changes in a particular case. City of Sandy v. Metro, 48 Or LUBA 363 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Express statutory authority for the Metropolitan Service District to take over local services if properly authorized to do so and to require changes in city and county land use regulations to address particular housing needs, patterns and practices of improper decision making does not necessarily mean that other statutes do not grant the Metropolitan Service District general authority to mandate changes in city and county land use regulations in other circumstances. City of Sandy v. Metro, 48 Or LUBA 363 (2005).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A comprehensive plan citizen participation provision that requires appointment of a three-person citizens' advisory committee when the planning commission is considering a major change to the local government's land use regulations is not correctly interpreted to give the planning commission unlimited discretion in deciding what changes constitute major changes. Dobson v. City of Newport, 47 Or LUBA 267 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city code that requires planned development proposals to preserve trees "to the greatest degree possible" does not require that the applicant fundamentally change the nature of the application to maximize tree preservation. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 47 Or LUBA 331 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city may not interpret a code exception for tree cutting permits to exempt a subdivision from a separate local code requirement for a tree protection plan, where the exemption for tree cutting permits has nothing to do with the separate tree protection plan requirement. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 47 Or LUBA 331 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city does not err by interpreting a code requirement that 20 percent of the site for a planned development be landscaped to allow an applicant to include areas of the site that will be included in common open space and left in their natural state. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 47 Or LUBA 331 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city council's conclusion that a tennis facility is accessory to residential use of a property is inconsistent with the text and context of its code, where the code defines an accessory use as uses incidental and subordinate to the primary use, and a city interpretation relies on the seasonal and nonprofit characteristics of the tennis facility and ignores other characteristics that demonstrate that the tennis facility is of much greater scale and intensity than the residential uses located on the property. McCormick v. City of Baker City, 46 Or LUBA 50 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code requirement that a house could only be allowed in a floodplain if "no alternative exists on the subject property which would allow the structure to be placed outside of the flood plain," does not require that an applicant reconfigure the proposed house or reduce the size of its footprint to locate the house outside the floodplain. Bonnett v. Deschutes County, 46 Or LUBA 318 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will affirm a city decision that interprets a comprehensive plan community park policy to describe a type of park and not to impose approval criteria for particular park developments, where relevant plan policies describe four categories of parks within the city, but neither the plan nor the zoning code includes minimum standards for the development of parks. Monogios and Co. v. City of Pendleton, 46 Or LUBA 356 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the challenged decision does not explain why the area of large covered porches attached to approved dwellings was not included in calculating the maximum "buildable area," and relevant code definitions suggest that such accessory structures are part of "buildings," remand is necessary to interpret the code and determine whether such structures should be included in calculating the buildable area. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 46 Or LUBA 509 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a county code defines "owner" to be the "legal owners(s) of record as shown on the tax rolls of the County," an interpretation that the fee simple owners are not owners because the value of the fee ownership is minimal in comparison to the value of the easement that crosses that property is not sustainable. Baker v. Washington County, 46 Or LUBA 591 (2004).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a standard requires that a developer design a subdivision to "minimize" its impact on significant natural areas, and a hearings officer interprets that standard not to limit the developer to the minimum number of lots allowed in the zone, that interpretation is reasonable, where the text and context of the standard show that the "minimization" envisioned by the standard is modification to site design, and not to the number of lots in the development. Neketin v. Washington County, 45 Or LUBA 495 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Local code requirements that a recreational use "shall not be the primary enterprise" of the property and that the recreational use must "be subordinate to the commercial agricultural operation in scope, scale and impact," need not be interpreted to require that the commercial agricultural use generate more income than the recreational use. A county's interpretation of those code requirements to necessitate comparison of the physical characteristics of the recreational use and the commercial farm use instead is not inconsistent with the language of the code. Underhill v. Wasco County, 45 Or LUBA 566 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer's interpretation of a local code to conclude that a "wholesale nursery" is properly viewed as an "agricultural use" is consistent with the text of the code's definition of "agricultural use," where the term is expressly defined to include "horticultural use." Lorenz v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 635 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government interpretation that the subject property constitutes a "neighborhood" for the purpose of determining whether a proposed development is consistent with a plan policy that requires maintaining existing residential density levels within existing neighborhoods is not subject to deference under ORS 197.829(1) because it is inconsistent with the definition of "neighborhood" set out in the zoning ordinance and the dictionary definition of that term. Roberts v. Clatsop County, 44 Or LUBA 178 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government interpretation that defines "existing residential density levels" as the maximum density allowed in the most intensive residential zoning district within the neighborhood is inconsistent with the text and apparent purpose of a policy that requires the local government to maintain existing residential density levels in established neighborhoods, because it does not take into account the majority of the property in the neighborhood that is zoned and developed at substantially lower density levels. Roberts v. Clatsop County, 44 Or LUBA 178 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where LUBA and the Court of Appeals have already decided that local ordinance provisions require that an applicant for a lot line adjustment demonstrate that the proposed use of the property after the lot line adjustment is served by adequate public facilities and is compatible with comprehensive plan policies, a city may not interpret those same provisions in such a way as to relieve an applicant of that burden. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 44 Or LUBA 308 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city did not err in interpreting a local code criterion that requires that "walkways" connect to "areas of the site such as * * * adjacent streets" to require that petitioner deed an easement to the city for a sidewalk crossing in front of petitioner's building through the center of its property in order to connect with adjacent streets on each side, where the city's definition of "walkway" requires that walkways be "accessible to the public." Hallmark Inns v. City of Lake Oswego, 44 Or LUBA 605 (2003).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local governing body's interpretation of its ordinance to allow it to impose conditions of approval when a dwelling is approved through the county's conditional use process, to address the impacts that the dwelling may have on big game habitat, is within the interpretive discretion afforded by ORS 197.829(1) and will be afforded deference by LUBA. Botham v. Union County, 43 Or LUBA 263 (2002).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The noise standard at OAR 340-034-0035(1)(b)(B) applies to a proposal to expand an existing aggregate mining site onto a neighboring property that has not been used for either industrial or commercial purposes within the 20-year period immediately preceding the application to mine the property. Morse Bros., Inc. v. Linn County, 42 Or LUBA 484 (2002).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The noise standard at OAR 340-034-0035(1)(b)(B) applies to a proposal to expand an existing aggregate mining site onto a neighboring property that has not been used for either industrial or commercial purposes within the 20-year period immediately preceding the application to mine the property. Morse Bros., Inc. v. Linn County, 42 Or LUBA 484 (2002).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A planning director's interpretation that the base point from which a building height is calculated is established by determining the elevation of property after fill has been placed on the property is correct where the context makes it clear that some manipulation of the elevation may be done so long as the fill has been placed pursuant to approved grading plans. Tirumali v. City of Portland, 41 Or LUBA 231 (2002).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A governing body's interpretation of a local provision is adequate for review where its findings articulate or demonstrate the governing body's understanding of the provision to a degree sufficient to resolve the issues raised in the petition for review. Huff v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 264 (2001).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a county ordinance requires that "major service activity areas" be "oriented away from existing dwellings," it is reasonable and correct to interpret the ordinance to be satisfied by modification and conditions that direct impacts of service activities away from existing dwellings. Knudsen v. Washington County, 39 Or LUBA 492 (2001).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the first clause of a local code provision requires that design review comply with a set of criteria used to rezone property and the second clause requires that design review also comply with those criteria addressed at the time the subject property was rezoned, a hearings officer's interpretation limiting design review to the subset of criteria addressed at the time the property was rezoned fails to give effect to the first clause of the code provision, and is therefore not reasonable and correct. Blazer Construction, Inc. v. City of Eugene, 36 Or LUBA 391 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government errs in declaring that an intergovernmental agreement no longer controls whereby the terms of that agreement it governs until specified recommendations are implemented, and the record shows that the recommendations have been only partially implemented. City of Salem/Marion County v. City of Keizer, 36 Or LUBA 262 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. An interpretation of a zoning ordinance that shifts the burden of demonstrating compliance with minimum lot size approval standards to opponents of the application is erroneous. Wood v. Crook County, 36 Or LUBA 143 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a code provision requires an applicant for expansion of a golf course on EFU-zoned land to demonstrate that alternative urban sites are not available and an applicant applies to expand an existing golf course, a hearings officer's interpretation of the provision as limiting the requisite alternative site analysis to locations where the existing golf course can expand is reasonable and correct. DLCD v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 88 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city council's implicit interpretation that a planning director's letter is not an "action or ruling" that may be appealed to the planning commission is inadequate for review, when LUBA cannot determine the legal basis for the city council's determination. Schultz v. City of Forest Grove, 35 Or LUBA 712 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The term "farm use" as defined in ORS 215.203(2)(a) is not a "delegative term," and a county commits no error by failing to adopt county legislation to clarify the meaning in advance of making a decision about whether a particular use qualifies as a "farm use." Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In determining whether a particular use qualifies as an "other agricultural or horticultural use," as that phrase is used in ORS 215.203(2)(a), there is no requirement that a county hearings officer develop a list of salient characteristics of such uses. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A proposal to site a drug and alcohol recovery facility within a single-family dwelling in a residential zone must be permitted when the relevant code provision permits outright those activities that are conducted in buildings "designed or used for the occupancy of one family" and the proposed recovery facility is to be located in such a structure. Recovery House VI v. City of Eugene, 35 Or LUBA 419 (1999).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A legislative enactment supersedes all of an administrative rule only if the enactment specifically and comprehensively contradicts all or nearly all of the critical components of an administrative rule. Northwest Aggregates Co. v. City of Scappoose, 35 Or LUBA 30 (1998).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 222.170(4) applies only to annexations conducted under ORS 222.170(1) and is not applicable to annexations conducted under ORS 222.125. Northwest Aggregates Co. v. City of Scappoose, 34 Or LUBA 498 (1998).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code requires that sewer facilities be "available" as a condition of approval for annexation, the local government's interpretation of the "available" criterion as being met where extension of sewer services is feasible within the current planning period is not clearly wrong. Northwest Aggregates Co. v. City of Scappoose, 34 Or LUBA 498 (1998).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA's analysis of a local government's interpretation of a local ordinance is not limited to the text and context of the provisions, but may also consider their purpose, and the effects thereon of a literal interpretation. Recovery House VI v. City of Eugene, 34 Or LUBA 486 (1998).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A code requirement that each lot in a subdivision be approved with provisions for sewage disposal is reasonably interpreted as not applying to lots that are not to be developed. Rochlin v. City of Portland, 34 Or LUBA 379 (1998).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. There is no basis for applying the doctrine of unique circumstances to local land use decisions. If local regulations make failure to timely file an appeal a jurisdictional defect, LUBA has no authority to develop an equitable remedy that overcomes such a defect. Mountain Gate Homeowners v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 169 (1998).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Amendments to ORS 197.830(6) that shorten the statutory deadline for filing a motion to intervene in a LUBA appeal impair the existing right to participate in an appeal. Thus, the statute applies prospectively in the absence of an expression of legislative intent to the contrary. Gutoski v. Lane County, 33 Or LUBA 866 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Generally, where the legislature fails to express any intention concerning the retroactivity of a statute, the statute applies only prospectively if the statute will impair existing rights, create new obligations or impose additional duties with respect to past transactions. Gutoski v. Lane County, 33 Or LUBA 866 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Although LUBA may interpret a local ordinance, it is not required to do so. Opp v. City of Portland, 33 Or LUBA 654 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where local code includes two different definitions of "campgrounds," a county decision approving a campground must address both definitions and determine whether one or both definitions apply and whether the proposed use complies with whatever definition applies. Donnelly v. Curry County, 33 Or LUBA 624 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The text and context of ORS 215.750 establish that a governing body may impose standards in addition to those in ORS 215.750. Evans v. Multnomah County, 33 Or LUBA 555 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. While LUBA does not formally defer to agency interpretations, it may properly look to agency interpretations for guidance in interpreting agency rules. DLCD v. Jackson County, 33 Or LUBA 302 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The word "shall," used in a regulation, expresses what is mandatory. A local government interpretation to the contrary is indefensible and will not be affirmed by LUBA. DLCD v. Tillamook County, 33 Or LUBA 163 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 215.705 precisely states comprehensive criteria that govern when a lot-of-record dwelling may be allowed. Under ORS 183.400 and ORS 215.304(3), OAR 660-33-020(4) cannot be interpreted to prohibit what the statute otherwise allows. DeBates v. Yamhill County, 32 Or LUBA 276 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 215.705 cannot be interpreted or supplemented by LCDC rule to provide that the reconfiguration of a tract through the sale of one or more lots extinguishes the right to build a dwelling on at least one of the lots of record within the original tract. DeBates v. Yamhill County, 32 Or LUBA 276 (1997).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Lot-of-record provisions should be interpreted as limited in their application to property owners who had a reasonable expectation in 1985 of a right to build a home. Walz v. Polk County, 31 Or LUBA 363 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The term "present owner," as it is used in ORS 215.705(1)(a), refers to a land sale contract vendee, not a land sale contract vendor. Walz v. Polk County, 31 Or LUBA 363 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The word "owner," as it is used in ORS 215.705, is not defined, and when applied to land generally, has no fixed and inflexible meaning. Walz v. Polk County, 31 Or LUBA 363 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A requirement that a significant amount of firearms training occur at a firearms training facility is not demanding enough under OAR 660-06-025(4)(m), because it places no limitation on other activities not directly related to or justified by firearms training. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Washington County, 31 Or LUBA 115 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will not defer to the opinion of an agency official, given informally after the adoption of an administrative rule, as to the meaning of that rule. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Washington County, 31 Or LUBA 115 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A zoning ordinance provision that states land use districts may "float" within the boundaries of a proposed planned development can be interpreted to mean that such districts may be dissolved and totally reconfigured, with densities reallocated. Huntzicker v. Washington County, 30 Or LUBA 397 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 197.829(2) permits LUBA, in cases where a local government fails to interpret adequately a provision of its land use regulations, to make its own determination of whether the local government decision is correct. Thompson v. City of St. Helens, 30 Or LUBA 339 (1996).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A comprehensive plan policy that does not set out approval criteria for a land use permit decision may nevertheless state an underlying purpose or policy with which the county's interpretation of its zoning ordinance must be consistent. DLCD v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 221 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Although ORS 197.829(2) allows LUBA, in certain circumstances, to interpret a local ordinance to the extent necessary to determine whether a local land use decision is correct, it is still the local government's responsibility to interpret its own comprehensive plan and land use regulations in the first instance, and LUBA is not required to do so. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 197.835(9)(b) and 197.829(2) authorize LUBA to remedy minor oversights and imperfections in local government land use decisions, but do not permit or require LUBA to assume the responsibilities assigned to local governments, such as the weighing of evidence, the preparation of adequate findings and the interpretation of comprehensive plans and local land use regulations. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When petitioners fail to satisfy the county's jurisdictional appeal provision requiring local appellants to state the basis of their standing, the county is not at liberty to take notice of petitioner s' standing or to excuse their failure satisfy the requirement as "harmless error." Tipton v. Coos County, 29 Or LUBA 474 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When a county zoning ordinance provision states that a local appeal will be dismissed if the requirements of the provision are not satisfied, the provision is jurisdictional. An appellant's failure to satisfy a jurisdictional requirement results in dismissal of the appeal. Tipton v. Coos County, 29 Or LUBA 474 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Code demolition permit pre-application requirements that the owner of historic property "endeavor to prepare an economically feasible plan" for preservation and "solicit purchase offers" must be interpreted in light of other code demolition permit provisions which clearly leave the decision to sell or not sell the historic property up to the property owner. Save Amazon Coalition v. City of Eugene, 29 Or LUBA 335 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local government's zoning ordinance establishes a process for administrative actions to determine the existence of nonconforming uses, and another local ordinance gives a compliance hearings officer jurisdiction over complaints regarding violations of the zoning ordinance, it is reasonable and correct to interpret these ordinances to require that the existence of a nonconforming use be determined through an administrative action, not raised as a defense in a compliance proceeding. Watson v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 602 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local code requires that a second farm dwelling be shown "conclusively" to be "necessary for the operation of the commercial farm," but does not define the term necessary, it is appropriate to use the dictionary definition of the term "necessary." Louks v. Jackson County, 28 Or LUBA 501 (1995).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA assigns no particular weight to a post-enactment statement by an agency administrator concerning the meaning of an administrative rule. Sensible Transportation v. Washington County, 28 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Documents prepared during the proceeding leading to the adoption of an administrative rule are legitimate administrative history which LUBA may consider in interpreting the administrative rule. Sensible Transportation v. Washington County, 28 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the local code defines the term "feedlot" to involve animals that are prepared for shipment to "market," it is neither reasonable nor correct to interpret "market" to mean only the "final" market to which the animals are shipped. Derry v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 212 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county does not err by interpreting a local code provision allowing "commercial or processing activities that are in conjunction with timber and farm uses," in a rural residential zone, in the same way the Oregon Supreme Court has interpreted similar language in the exclusive farm use zoning statutes. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A hearings officer correctly construes a local code provision allowing "commercial or processing activities that are in conjunction with timber and farm uses "in the relevant rural area to require that a landscaping business' sales and purchases be primarily to customers and from suppliers that constitute timber or farm uses in the relevant rural area. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the term "farm use" is defined in a rural residential zone to include noncommercial farms, and it appears from the challenged decision that the hearings officer may not have considered noncommercial farms in determining whether a landscaping business qualifies as a commercial or processing activity "in conjunction with timber and farm uses," the decision will be remanded. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local government decision amending its land use regulations does not interpret comprehensive plan goals and map designations as being inapplicable to such amendments, but rather explains how the proposed amendment implements certain comprehensive plan goals and is consistent with certain plan map designations, it is clear the governing body interprets those plan goals and map designations as being applicable to the land use regulation amendment. Melton v. City of Cottage Grove, 28 Or LUBA 1 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 197.307(5)(d) expresses an alternative standard that is satisfied if the exterior materials of a manufactured home either (1) are similar those commonly used on dwellings in the community, or (2) are comparable to those used on surrounding dwellings. Because local governments cannot adopt standards more restrictive than those set out in ORS 197.307(5), a city cannot interpret a local regulation implementing ORS 197.307(5)(d) as allowing it to require, in a particular instance, that a manufactured home must satisfy the second alternative. Brewster v. City of Keizer, 27 Or LUBA 432 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 215.316(1) (1993) expresses a legislative intent to retroactively prohibit counties from designating resource lands as marginal lands, and from adopting plan and code provisions allowing additional nonresource uses on such marginal lands, after January 1, 1993. ORS 215.316(1) (1993) does not express an intent to retroactively prohibit counties that have not designated marginal lands from applying either ORS 215.283 (1991) or the supposedly stricter provisions of 215.213(1) to (3) (1991) to their exclusive farm use zones. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Marion County, 27 Or LUBA 303 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under ORS 197.829, LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own enactments, unless the local interpretation is contrary to the express words, purpose or policy of the enactment, or is inconsistent with a statute, goal or rule that the enactment implements. Shelter Resources, Inc. v. City of Cannon Beach, 27 Or LUBA 229 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The comprehensive plan provisions comprising a city's urban growth management program are clearly designed to implement Statewide Planning Goals 11 and 14. Therefore, a city errs in interpreting such plan provisions to allow the extension of urban sewage treatment service outside an urban growth boundary. DLCD v. City of Donald, 27 Or LUBA 208 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a code provision requires that effects on an area's "appearance and function" be determined based specifically on factors set out in that provision, a local government may interpret the code provision to be satisfied by a determination based solely on those factors, even if the code also provides that words have their "normal dictionary meaning," and the dictionary definitions of "appearance" and "function" suggest additional factors are relevant. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 106 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 197.829(1), (2) and (3) essentially codify the standard of review imposed by Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). ORS 197.829(4) limits or qualifies the Clark standard of review in certain circumstances. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government interpretation of one of its forest zones in a manner that would permit asphalt batch plants to operate permanently, so long as there were periodic interruptions, does not conflict with the Goal 4 rule, which envisions both permanent and temporary asphalt batch plants. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Absent some specific indication of contrary intent, terms are read consistently throughout a statute. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where an exclusive farm use zone does not allow asphalt batch plants or their accessory uses, and petitioner contends the county erred by permitting a private access road across exclusive farm used zoned property to serve an asphalt batch plant, the county must respond in its decision to that interpretive question. Where the county fails to do so and simply concludes such roads are allowable, the decision must be remanded so that the county can adopt an interpretive response adequate for LUBA review. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county surface mining ordinance that retains several operating and reclamation standards from the prior surface mining ordinance did not "repeal" the prior ordinance, because the new ordinance does not "supersede all material particulars" of the prior ordinance. Oregon City Leasing, Inc. v. Columbia County, 26 Or LUBA 203 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local government has not adopted traditional, strict variance standards, it may interpret a variance approval standard requiring a variance to be "the minimum variance necessary to make reasonable use of the property" as requiring that (1) the proposed use be a reasonable use of the subject property, and (2) the requested variance be the minimum necessary to allow the proposed use. Friends of Bryant Woods Park v. Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 185 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government cannot simply conclude its failure to list shopping centers as a permitted or conditional use in any existing zoning district creates an ambiguity and, on that basis, determine it will allow shopping centers as a conditional use in a particular zoning district. Such an action constitutes improperly amending the zoning ordinance in the guise of interpreting it. Loud v. City of Cottage Grove, 26 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under ORS 215.448(1)(c), home occupations may not be conducted outside the dwelling and other buildings normally associated with permitted uses in the zone. ORS 215.448(1)(c) does not provide for a de minimis exception to that requirement. Weuster v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 425 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code provision requiring that "consideration * * * be given to [certain specified] factors" does not establish mandatory approval standards for local government decisions, but rather merely lists "factors" which the local government must consider. Frankton Neigh. Assoc. v. Hood River County, 25 Or LUBA 386 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA must defer to a local government's interpretation of its own land use regulations unless the interpretation is clearly wrong. A county interpretation that a facility for an annual equestrian event qualifies as a "rodeo" or a "livestock arena" is not clearly wrong. Cooley v. Deschutes County, 25 Or LUBA 350 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA is not bound by legal precedents established by circuit court decisions in unrelated cases. Skydive Oregon v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 294 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the local code requires that the subject property be reasonably suited for the "use proposed," a local government does not err by determining the suitability of the entire parcel for the proposed use and not just the site of the proposed residence. Clarke v. City of Hillsboro, 25 Or LUBA 195 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government interpretation of a local code provision which prohibits direct access to major collectors by commercial, industrial and institutional uses with more than 150 feet of frontage as not applying to proposed residential subdivisions with more than 150 feet of frontage is reasonable. Miller v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local government may interpret the term "processing of aggregate," as used in an industrial zoning district of its code, to include asphalt plants, even though the code language was adopted at a time when LUBA had interpreted similar language in the EFU statute not to include asphalt plants. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. While a local government is not obliged to respond to a taking claim raised during the local proceedings, the local government should, in the first instance, have an opportunity to respond to a taking issue during the local proceedings. Where there is more than one possible interpretation of the local approval standards, the local government should have the opportunity to adopt an interpretation that is constitutional. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A requirement in a local code that development be "consistent" with comprehensive plan policies and standards, is a general requirement that does not transform otherwise nonmandatory plan standards into approval standards. McGowan v. City of Eugene, 24 Or LUBA 540 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. While a local government is not obliged to respond to a taking claim raised during the local proceedings, the local government should, in the first instance, have an opportunity to respond to a taking issue during the local proceedings. Where there is more than one possible interpretation of the local approval standards, the local government should at least have the opportunity, if possible, to adopt an interpretation that is constitutional. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. It is clearly contrary to the express terms of a local ordinance standard requiring a determination that "the type of farm products produced on the applicant's farm" be unrepresented within a particular area, to determine the standard is satisfied by a showing that there are no similar farm management methodologies employed on farms in the designated area. Giesy v. Benton County, 24 Or LUBA 328 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. That area farms produce either purebred cattle or sheep, rather than a combination of purebred cattle and she ep, is not a basis for determining there are no similar farm products produced in the designated area. Giesy v. Benton County, 24 Or LUBA 328 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a "substantial construction" standard in a local code is clear enough for an applicant to know what he must show during the application process, such a standard is not impermissibly vague. Columbia River Television v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 82 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. In evaluating the compliance of an application for a conditional use permit for a bed and breakfast with a local traffic impacts approval standard, it is proper to evaluate the impacts of a reasonable residential use of the dwelling, together with the proposed bed and breakfast use. Adler v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the local code lists uses as conditionally permitted, such listing does not, of itself, imply that the local government must approve all applications for conditional uses or that it is limited to the imposition of conditions of approval. Adler v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Subsequent changes in county ordinances do not affect an energy facility for which a site certificate has been approved by EFSC. Under ORS 469.400(5), a county is required to issue the "appropriate permits" for such an energy facility, regardless of whether a subsequent change in county ordinances makes the "appropriate permit" a type different from that which was appropriate when the site certificate was approved. McDole v. Lane County, 23 Or LUBA 500 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the maximum penalty for each separate violation of an ordinance is 500 dollars, and there is no possibility of imprisonment for violating the ordinance, the penalties provided by the ordinance are civil, not criminal, in nature. Therefore, a vagueness challenge based solely on the constitutional vagueness analysis applied where criminal sanctions are possible, provides no basis for reversal or remand of such ordinance. Cope v. City of Cannon Beach, 23 Or LUBA 233 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local ordinance that prohibits the short term rental use of dwellings in residential zones is not an unlawful rent control regulation under ORS 91.225. Cope v. City of Cannon Beach, 23 Or LUBA 233 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code jurisdictional requirement that the local appeal document, which under the code includes the required appeal fee, be "signed" but which does not state where such signature must be located, is satisfied by the local appellant's signature on his personal check submitted as the filing fee. Breivogel v. Washington County, 23 Or LUBA 143 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The language in ORS 197.247(1)(a) that "[t]he proposed marginal land was not managed, during three of the five calendar years preceding January 1, 1983 * * *" applies to forest as well as farm operations. DLCD v. Lane County, 23 Or LUBA 33 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a local government elects to limit the length of cul-de-sac streets, it may also establish how the length of such streets is to be measured. However, where no particular method of measuring the length of cul-de-sac streets is specified in its land use regulations, the local government must determine length applying the regulations as they are written and applying the plain and ordinary meaning of the operative term "length." Sully v. City of Ashland, 23 Or LUBA 25 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code requirement that a review body may not consider a request for a conditional use permit within one year following a previous denial of "such" request, prohibits submission of a conditional use permit application for the same use on the same property as previously denied. It does not prohibit the submission of a conditional use permit application for a different use of the property. Silani v. Klamath County, 22 Or LUBA 734 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a proposed residential detoxification facility will take blood pressure and body temperature of potential admittees, but will refuse to admit anyone in need of medical attention and will not provide any medication or medical treatment on site, a local government's determination that the proposed facility will provide "primarily" health care is erroneous as a matter of law. Harmony House, Inc. v. City of Salem, 22 Or LUBA 629 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A permit condition stating all log trucks must "depart the [subject] property as near to 4:00 a.m. as possible "is correctly interpreted to require that all log trucks must leave the subject property at 4:00 a.m., unless it is not possible to do so. Such a condition is violated where log trucks departed from the property on several occasions at 6:30 a.m. for the convenience of the applicant's logging operation. Marson v. Clackamas County, 22 Or LUBA 497 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A statutory change in the tribunal with appellate jurisdiction affects the legal rights and obligations of parties arising out of past transactions, and retrospective application of such a change in jurisdictional statutes to pending appeals is not appropriate. Schultz v. City of Grants Pass, 22 Or LUBA 457 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The factors listed in ORS 822.140(3)(a) to (f) are considerations for the adoption of ordinances regulating the siting or expansion of wrecking yards. These factors are not approval standards for applications for local approval of individual Department of Motor Vehicles wrecking certificates. Bradbury v. City of Independence, 22 Or LUBA 398 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A comprehensive plan provision requiring that conflicts between conditional uses and airports be "minimized" is not violated by approval of a proposed conditional use simply because other possible uses allowed in the zone would have fewer conflicts with airports. So long as conflicts between the proposed conditional use and airports are minimized, that other possible uses might have fewer conflicts is irrelevant. Waker Associates, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 22 Or LUBA 233 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Whether the provisions of a zoning ordinance "purpose" section are approval criteria for individual land use decisions depends on the wording of the specific provisions and their context. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 22 Or LUBA 166 (1992).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a zoning ordinance definition of "motel" is broad enough to include transient housing available only to groups using a convention center, the city may properly consider such transient housing as motel units available to satisfy temporary housing demand. Hay v. City of Cannon Beach, 21 Or LUBA 364 (1991).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA cannot take official notice of local legislative history. Therefore, because LUBA's review is confined to the record of the local proceeding, LUBA cannot consider local legislative history if it is not in the record. 19th Street Project v. City of the Dalles, 20 Or LUBA 440 (1991).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the comprehensive plan requires an "urban level of service" of schools, but does not define "urban level of service," a city does not err in interpreting that term consistent with the school district's "considerations" for providing adequate school facilities. However, because those school district considerations were not adopted by the city as standards, the city did not err by failing to adopt findings specifically addressing each consideration when approving a development. Axon v. City of Lake Oswego, 20 Or LUBA 108 (1990).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where plan standards identify nonfarm uses that may be allowed in the county's exclusive farm use zone and require that such uses be "minimized," a plan standard requiring that "development" not occur on lands capable of sustaining accepted farming practices is properly interpreted as not applying to the nonfarm uses specifically allowed in the exclusive farm use zone. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 19 Or LUBA 404 (1990).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. There is no irresolvable conflict between a plan standard directing that golf courses be allowed in an exclusive farm use zone and a plan standard providing that development may not occur on lands capable of sustaining accepted agricultural practices. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 19 Or LUBA 404 (1990).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the comprehensive plan is defined as including the plan policy document, plan map, zoning map and zoning and subdivision ordinances, as well as a number of other documents, a local code provision requiring that individual land use decisions comply with the comprehensive plan is not correctly interpreted as requiring compliance with only the zoning map and zoning and subdivision ordinances. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 19 Or LUBA 404 (1990).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The legislative history of a bill includes all items in the official state records documenting its enactment, including staff measure analyses and exhibits to legislative committee hearing minutes. Foland v. Jackson County, 18 Or LUBA 731 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The destination resort statute was intended to codify the parallel provisions of Goal 8, as they were interpreted when the statute was enacted; and, therefore, the administrative history of those Goal 8 provisions is relevant to interpretation of the destination resort statute. Foland v. Jackson County, 18 Or LUBA 731 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will consider legislative or administrative history materials, when such materials are necessary to its interpretation of statutes, administrative rules or ordinances, regardless of whether the materials are in the record of the proceedings below. Foland v. Jackson County, 18 Or LUBA 731 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Some weight should be given, in interpreting the destination resort statute, to DLCD's interpretations of the identical Goal 8 provisions, as DLCD is charged with adopting and administering the statewide planning goals. Foland v. Jackson County, 18 Or LUBA 731 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When LUBA interprets a provision of a comprehensive plan or zoning ordinance, it construes the plan or ordinance as a whole and gives effect to its overall policy. Beck v. City of Tillamook, 18 Or LUBA 587 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The meaning of local legislation is a question of law which must be decided by LUBA on appeal. Beck v. City of Tillamook, 18 Or LUBA 587 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where city ordinance (1) allows "public facility" as a conditional use in a commercial zone, (2) defines public facility as a facility deemed necessary for "the maintenance of public purposes," (3) does not distinguish between residential and nonresidential "public facilities," and (4) lists hospitals and nursing homes as examples of uses considered to be "public facilities," "public facility" can include uses which are residential in nature, such as a homeless shelter. Beck v. City of Tillamook, 18 Or LUBA 587 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where county comprehensive plan policies provide that structural methods of shoreline stabilization will only be allowed if (1) an existing structure is threatened by erosion, (2) that threat creates a critical need to protect the structure, and (3) higher priority methods will not work to provide adequate protection to the structure, LUBA interprets "critical need to protect the structure" to mean that it is reasonably probable that the structure will suffer damage due to the threatened erosion in the near future. Gray v. Clatsop County, 18 Or LUBA 561 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. When LUBA interprets a provision of a comprehensive plan or zoning ordinance, it construes the plan or ordinance as a whole and gives effect to its overall policy. Also, where possible, LUBA reads plan or ordinance provisions together in a manner which gives meaning to all their parts. Gray v. Clatsop County, 18 Or LUBA 561 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The correct interpretation of local ordinance provisions is a question of law. The provisions of a comprehensive zoning ordinance should be construed as a whole, and effect given to the ordinance's overall policy. Miller v. City of Dunes City, 18 Or LUBA 515 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where standards embodied in a local comprehensive plan goal and the policies that follow the goal are subjective and generally worded, the local government applying such goa ls and policies enjoys significant discretion in determining whether particular factors are sufficient to show that a proposal is consistent with or supportive of the goal. Henry v. City of Portland, 18 Or LUBA 440 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Internally contradictory and generally worded local planning goals must be read as a whole, so that the overall public policy expressed in the goal is not frustrated. Henry v. City of Portland, 18 Or LUBA 440 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The application of a particular zoning designation to a parcel is not the equivalent of a determination that an existing use on such parcel conforms with the particular zoning designation applied. Moorefield v. City of Corvallis, 18 Or LUBA 95 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where an ordinance provision requires both that a proposed use comply with all "local, state and federal standards," and that the proposed use not "create a nuisance," the local government's determination that the proposed use complies with DEQ regulations does not remove the necessity for an independent determination that the proposed use will not "create a nuisance." Moorefield v. City of Corvallis, 18 Or LUBA 95 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 215.448(1)(c) requires only that an existing building proposed to be used for a home occupation, be a structure normally found in association with uses permitted in the zone. It does not require, in an exclusive farm use zone, that any part of such building be used for farm use concurrently with its use for the home occupation. Joseph v. Lane County, 18 Or LUBA 41 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where local government ordinance provisions are drafted to correspond to a state statute, it is appropriate to construe those ordinance provisions consistently with the statute. Joseph v. Lane County, 18 Or LUBA 41 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 215.448(3) limits the approval of new buildings for use for home occupations. It does not impose additional limitations on the use of existing buildings for home occupations. Joseph v. Lane County, 18 Or LUBA 41 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the county code provides that types of uses not otherwise permitted in an exclusive farm use zone may be allowed as home occupations, it is incorrect to interpret a code requirement that a home occupation not interfere with nearby existing uses or with other uses permitted under the exclusive farm use zone as presuming that noise not agricultural in nature constitutes interference with adjoining uses. Joseph v. Lane County, 18 Or LUBA 41 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A plan policy which provides guidance as to which zoning district to apply to a given area is not an approval criterion for conditional use permits. Highway 213 Coalition v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 1284 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The wording and context of a specific code intent and purpose statement determines whether that provision should be interpreted to impose mandatory approval criteria. Randall v. Washington County, 17 Or LUBA 1202 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The legislature's use of the term "may" in ORS 443.600(3), 215.213(2)(m) and 215.283(2)(n), with regard to allowing "residential homes" on land zoned for exclusive farm use, demonstrates that the legislature did not intend to require counties to authorize "residential homes" as a conditional use on EFU zoned land. Mental Health Division v. Lake County, 17 Or LUBA 1165 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A county interpretation that a notice of appeal from a planning commission decision is properly filed prior to the date the planning commission decision became final, is a correct interpretation of the ordinance, absent ordinance language requiring the decisions of the planning commission be reduced to writing before those decisions may be considered final for purposes of appeal. Thompson v. Columbia County, 17 Or LUBA 818 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A local code that is internally inconsistent is ambiguous. Kenton Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Portland, 17 Or LUBA 784 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The courts and LUBA are finally responsible for the interpretation of local enactments. However, where an erroneous interpretation of other code provisions results in a city failing to interpret and apply an ambiguous provision of its code, LUBA will remand the decision to the city for it to interpret and apply the applicable provision in the first instance. Great Northwest Towing v. City of Portland, 17 Or LUBA 544 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. To find a proposed conditional use is "appropriate," as required by local standards governing conditional uses, does not require a finding that there will be no adverse impacts. Coffey v. City of North Bend, 17 Or LUBA 527 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where an ordinance expressly provides that listed examples are not an inclusive list of "governmental structures or land uses," a public educational facility and county office building may be considered governmental structures of land uses. Bennett v. City of Dallas, 17 Or LUBA 450 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city ordinance provides that structures must have "comparable scale" and "comparable architectural features" to the existing structures in the neighborhood, LUBA cannot agree with the city that a proposed 110-foot water tower and adjacent houses have comparable scale and architectural features. Sunburst II Homeowners v. City of West Linn, 17 Or LUBA 401 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. An approval criterion which requires the provision of an adequate buffer and that certain factors be assessed in determining the adequacy of such buffer, vests considerable discretion in the approval authority. Sunburst II Homeowners v. City of West Linn, 17 Or LUBA 401 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the county code's "commercial activities that are exclusively used in conjunction with farm use" (emphasis added) standard is worded more stringently than ORS 215.283(2)(a), it is appropriate to interpret the code provision to restrict severely the commercial activities allowed. The county's interpretation of its code standard not to include a use which would process an unspecified amount of minerals, and other materials that are not farm or forest products, is both reasonable and correct. Kellogg Lake Friends v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 369 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where local government ordinance was drafted to implement a state statute or statewide planning goal, and adopts the statutory or goal language without expressing an intent to deviate from the statutory or goal intent, it is proper to construe the ordinance provisions consistently with the statute or goal. Kellogg Lake Friends v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 277 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Interpreting the county's Willamette River Greenway zoning district requirement for a setback from "mean low water level" to refer only to the Willamette River, and not to other bodies of water within the Greenway, is reasonable and consistent with other related plan and ordinance provisions. Kellogg Lake Friends v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 277 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where local ordinance language corresponds to the overall "Goal" statement of Statewide Planning Goal 15 (Willamette River Greenway), and there are no other local plan or ordinance provisions or legislative history which indicates an intent that the ordinance phrase "lands along the Willamette River" be interpreted differently than the same phrase in Goal 15, the phrase is interpreted to include all land within the Greenway. Kellogg Lake Friends v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 277 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. After-the-fact testimony from persons involved in the legislative process concerning their opinion as to what legislators intended when they enacted legislation is incompetent for the purpose of determining legislative intent. Kellogg Lake Friends v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 277 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a provision of county ordinance was drafted to correspond to a state statute, it is appropriate to construe that ordinance provision consistently with the statute, in light of any existing authority analyzing or applying that statute. McCaw Communications, Inc. v. Marion County, 17 Or LUBA 206 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The amendment of ORS 215.213(1)(d) by Oregon Laws 1983, chapter 827, section 27b was clearly intended to limit transmission towers, previously allowable in EFU zones as "utility facilities necessary for public service," to those 200 feet or less in height. McCaw Communications, Inc. v. Marion County, 17 Or LUBA 206 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where the county code defines a structure as "anything * * * constructed and located on * * * the ground," and exemptions from the requirement for a development permit for certain accessory uses apply only if no structure is permitted, LUBA will conclude that a bridge and sidewalk incidental to residential construction are subject to the development permit requirement. Peyton v. Washington County, 17 Or LUBA 92 (1989).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where ORS 215.213(2), together with the county code, require that commercial activities in conjunction with farm use comply with the purpose and intent of the county's EFU zone, the county properly concluded a proposed restaurant in conjunction with a winery was inconsistent with the intent and purpose of the EFU zone, unless conditioned to make the restaurant subordinate and auxiliary to the winery. Flynn v. Polk County, 17 Or LUBA 68 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Statutory prohibitions against retroactive land use regulations protect uses that exist when the regulations are adopted, not uses that could have been, but were not, initiated. Schoonover v. Klamath County, 16 Or LUBA 846 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Under ORS 197.605 to 197.635 (1981), the running of the 30-day period for filing objections to or appeals of post-acknowledgment amendments is contingent upon the objector or appellant being given the notice of the decision required by ORS 197.615. Kellogg Lake Friends v. City of Milwaukie, 16 Or LUBA 755 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. An ordinance provision which states that a county appellate body overturning or modifying a previous decision must make certain findings will not be interpreted to alter the general authority given by the ordinance to county decision makers to impose conditions when approving land use actions. Sevcik v. Jackson County, 16 Or LUBA 710 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The interpretation of local ordinance provisions is a question of law which LUBA reviews for correctness. Sevcik v. Jackson County, 16 Or LUBA 710 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. County interpretation of a condition of partition approval requiring dust free maintenance of a road to apply only during construction is incorrect because such interpretation is inconsistent with the common meaning of "maintenance" and the use of that term elsewhere in the county code. Barbee v. Josephine County, 16 Or LUBA 695 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where neither county plan nor implementing ordinances identify Douglas fir as the sole indicator species for determining whether land is "commercial forest land," the plan's definition of "commercial forest land" cannot be interpreted as encompassing only production of Douglas fir. Holland v. Lane County, 16 Or LUBA 583 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. The city's decision to allow use of the subject property for other than a school is not error where the city comprehensive plan and zoning maps identify the subject property as a future school site, but the plan text clearly provides that school sites are intended to indicate general locations and not specific sites. Dickas v. City of Beaverton, 16 Or LUBA 574 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. It is reasonable and correct to interpret an ordinance standard that a proposed use "at the particular location is desirable to the public convenience and welfare" as requiring determinations that (1) there is a public need for the proposed use, and (2) the proposed location is suitable for meeting that public need. Tournier v. City of Portland, 16 Or LUBA 546 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. City's interpretation of its code to require compliance with both preexisting use reestablishment standards and current Greenway Scenic Development Overlay (WSD) standards applicable to changes and intensification is reasonable. Sellwood Harbor Condo Assoc. v. City of Portland, 16 Or LUBA 505 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where ambiguity exists in acknowledged comprehensive plan and code provisions, the county's reasonable interpretation of the provisions will be upheld. Bergstrom v. Klamath County, 16 Or LUBA 435 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. An ordinance requirement that a proposed nonfarm partition and dwelling "does not materially alter the stability of the overall land use pattern of the area" is not satisfied by consideration only of parcels adjoining the proposed development site or the access road leading to the proposed development site, as such consideration would not provide analysis of the "overall land use pattern of the area." Morley v. Marion County, 16 Or LUBA 385 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Zoning ordinance provision requiring that development be compatible with the "scenic view" does not require city to consider compatibility of a proposed motel with other existing structures in the vicinity. Marineau v. City of Bandon, 16 Or LUBA 375 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where city comprehensive plan includes policies promoting development along a bluff above the ocean and policies which address the view of the ocean from this bluff, the city may interpret its zoning ordinance provision requiring that development on the bluff be compatible with the "scenic view" to protect only the view of the Pacific Ocean from the bluff, not the scenic view of the bluff from the beach. Marineau v. City of Bandon, 16 Or LUBA 375 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Absent clear language limiting the time a waiver may be granted under a code section providing for waiver of appeal fees, the county's interpretation of that provision to allow waiver of the appeal fee after the appeal period has run is reasonable and LUBA will defer to it. Rustrum v. Clackamas County, 16 Or LUBA 369 (1988).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Absent a showing that a residential PUD will increase noise levels beyond those expected of residential development permitted by right in the subject zone, there can be no violation of a city policy which protects neighborhoods from "detrimental noise pollution." Semler v. City of Portland, 16 Or LUBA 320 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. It is reasonable to interpret an ordinance permit approval criterion that the proposed use "not have a significant adverse impact on identified fish or wildlife habitat "to refer only to sensitive fish or wildlife habitat areas identified as such on maps in the county's comprehensive plan. McCoy v. Linn County, 16 Or LUBA 295 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. "Compatibility," as used in the planning and zoning context, requires that uses be capable of co-existing harmoniously, not that there be no adverse impact or interference of any type. McCoy v. Marion County, 16 Or LUBA 284 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a county ordinance prohibits "contamination or impairment" of groundwater aquifers, but neither "contamination" nor "impairment" is defined in the county plan or ordinances, a county interpretation that there is no "contamination" or "impairment" so long as the turbidity increase does not exceed 10 percent is reasonable. Lousignont v. Union County, 16 Or LUBA 272 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A road vacation petition signed by contract purchasers, rather than owners, of subject and abutting property does not authorize a county to conduct summary road vacation proceedings under ORS 368.351, even if the county makes the vacation contingent upon completion of purchase. Harding v. Clackamas County, 16 Or LUBA 224 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. ORS 368.351 allowing a shortened procedure for vacation of county roads, without notice and hearing, when "owners of 100% of any private property proposed to be vacated and * * * owners of 100% of the property abutting any public property proposed to be vacated" consent to the vacation, is available only when all owners of all recorded interests consent to the street vacation. Harding v. Clackamas County, 16 Or LUBA 224 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where county ordinance defines mobile homes as structures manufactured after a certain date, a unit manufactured before that date is not a mobile home within the definition of the county's ordinance. Schnidrig v. Hood River County, 16 Or LUBA 215 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where county ordinance describes a double-wide mobile home as affixed to real property by a continuous concrete wall foundation or other appropriate foundation, LUBA will sustain the county in its interpretation that this foundation requirement is a set-up requirement, not a feature defining whether a particular unit is or is not a double-wide mobile home. Schnidrig v. Hood River County, 16 Or LUBA 215 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where county ordinance does not define the width of double-wide mobile homes, and nothing in the ordinance suggests the width of a particular structure meets or does not meet the definition of a single-wide or a double-wide mobile home, petitioner's claim that the county erred in applying its definitions of single-wide and double-wide mobile homes by failing to make findings on the width of a particular mobile home will fail. Schnidrig v. Hood River County, 16 Or LUBA 215 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a county ordinance defines a double-wide mobile home as a combination or joining of two or more chassis or sections, but does not define "chassis," a county interpretation that each section of a type of mobile home which is single width when transported, but which extends along its full length when installed in the ground, is supported by its own chassis is reasonable and not contrary to the language of the ordinance. Schnidrig v. Hood River County, 16 Or LUBA 215 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. A city is entitled to weigh conflicting provisions in its planning documents, particularly where the provisions are stated in general terms rather than as approval standards applicable to all development. Marshall v. City of Eugene, 16 Or LUBA 206 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. City tentative PUD approval of a golf course does not violate a charter provision authorizing use of bond proceeds to acquire property for "recreational uses." Marshall v. City of Eugene, 16 Or LUBA 206 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Increasing the types of uses authorized in existing commercial areas does not violate plan policy that areas for commercial centers should not be increased without a showing of need. Greenwood Inn v. City of Beaverton, 16 Or LUBA 177 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Plan provision describing the effect on auto use from limited commercial development in CI zone is a description, not a goal or policy, and therefore not a criterion for the selection of types of commercial use appropriate in the CI zone. Greenwood Inn v. City of Beaverton, 16 Or LUBA 177 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Adding hotels to the list of authorized commercial uses in the CI zone is not inconsistent with zone provision that all new commercial uses, including those listed, offer products or services primarily for the convenience or necessity of employees and businesses in the CI zone. Greenwood Inn v. City of Beaverton, 16 Or LUBA 177 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Given a comprehensive plan policy allowing a limited number of complementary commercial uses in industrial parks, the city may interpret the policy to allow hotels in its Campus Industrial (CI) zone. Greenwood Inn v. City of Beaverton, 16 Or LUBA 177 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Because nothing in Goal 15 or case law suggests that "greatest possible degree," as used in Goal 15, means something more restrictive than the city's definition, the city's interpretation is reasonable and LUBA will not overturn it. Urquhart v. City of Eugene, 16 Or LUBA 102 (1987).

1.1.1 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. Where a city's plan provides that planning decisions must be in accord with the "policies of the comprehensive plan," LUBA will interpret the plan policies as mandatory standards rather than mere guidelines. Hummel v. City of Brookings, 16 Or LUBA 1 (1987).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a county ordinance provides considerable discretion in deciding whether a proposed use will have more than a "minimal" impact on the area, LUBA is not empowered to substitute its judgment for the county's on matters of aesthetics and ordinance interpretation, providing the county's interpretation is reasonable. Valley View Nursery v. Jackson County, 15 Or LUBA 591 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where county ordinance and ORS 215.283(1)(f) allow "dwellings and other buildings customarily provided in conjunction with farm use" as permitted uses, a county determination as to whether a proposed dwelling is "customarily provided in conjunction with farm use" involves the exercise of judgment and discretion and, therefore, a building permit for such a proposed dwelling falls within the definition of "permit" found in ORS 215.402(4). Doughton v. Douglas County, 15 Or LUBA 576 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. LUBA will deter to a county's interpretation of ambiguous provisions in its ordinance providing the interpretation is not contrary to the express language of the ordinance. Mill Creek Glen Protec. Assn. v. Umatilla County, 15 Or LUBA 563 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where city ordinance provides that variances "ordinarily" should not be granted if the special circumstances upon which the applicant relies are a result of actions of the applicant, owner or previous owner, the city may approve a variance even where the exceptional circumstances relied upon are self-created. Cope v. Cannon Beach, 15 Or LUBA 546 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. An ordinance variance standard that there be "exceptional or extraordinary circumstances or conditions * * * which do not apply generally to other properties in the same zone" requires a strict interpretation, that the "exceptional or extraordinary circumstances "must arise out of the land itself. Cope v. Cannon Beach, 15 Or LUBA 546 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Comprehensive plan policies which are described in the plan as serving "as a guide" to land use decision s are not mandatory approval standards, and therefore nonconformance with such policies is not grounds for remand by LUBA. Citizens for Better Transit v. Metro Service Dist., 15 Or LUBA 482 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Ordinance which uses but does not define "special education," and refers to the financial impact on school districts imposed by state law but makes no reference to federal law, will be interpreted to use the definition of special education found in state law. Lane County School Dist. 71 v. Lane County, 15 Or LUBA 476 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Although public rights-of-way are generally assumed to be permitted in every zone, ordinance Greenway zone purpose and setback provisions limiting this zone designation to uses which are clearly water-dependent or water-related, together with an express provision that roads are not generally considered dependent on or related to a water location, make a city's interpretation of its Greenway zone as permitting freeways unreasonable. Allen v. City of Portland, 15 Or LUBA 464 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A city's interpretation of an ordinance Greenway exemption provision as applying to a freeway on-ramp is not reasonable where the ordinance provision reads as an exhaustive list of exempt uses, rather than as a guide to interpreting the ordinance, and freeway systems are not listed as exempt. Allen v. City of Portland, 15 Or LUBA 464 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A local government is entitled to interpret ambiguous provisions of its zoning code, and LUBA will defer to that interpretation if it is reasonable. Hood River Valley Residents Comm. v. City of Hood River, 15 Or LUBA 458 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Under county ordinance definition of "lot," adjacent t ax lots under common ownership do not constitute separate "lots." Hopper v. Clackamas County, 15 Or LUBA 413 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Under county ordinance definition of "lot," property under common ownership does not lose its unitary character as one lot simply because it happens to be divided by a road. Hershberger v. Clackamas County, 15 Or LUBA 401 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Land division ordinance street alignment requirement will be interpreted as applying to preexisting streets serving the proposed land division, absent specific ordinance language to the contrary. Jarvis v. Wallowa County, 15 Or LUBA 390 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a governing body is not required to take action on a submitted amendment to an urban renewal plan, its proceedings to consider the proposed amendment are legislative in nature. Estate of Paul Gold v. City of Portland, 15 Or LUBA 385 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. City ordinance definition of multi-family dwelling will not be interpreted as including motels where such interpretation would allow motels in the city's residential zone, a result clearly inconsistent with the purpose of that zone. Marineau v. City of Bandon, 15 Or LUBA 375 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Ordinance design standard which expressly applies to "subdivisions, attached un it residential developments and commercial developments" will not be interpreted as applying to mobile home parks, because to do so would be adding words to the ordinance that are plainly not there. Everts v. Washington County, 15 Or LUBA 358 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. In the absence of a provision in a new ordinance preserving approval procedures in the former ordinance, the new ordinance will control approval of all subdivision plats, including those plats receiving preliminary approval prior to the effective date of the new ordinance. Rosenfeld v. City of Lake Oswego, 15 Or LUBA 312 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. County ordinance criterion for partitioning of an existing dwelling on forest land; which requires a finding that the dwelling "will not be needed to house forest help, does not require that a partition be denied because an existing dwelling might someday be needed to house forest workers. Such a criterion does require consideration of present use of the subject property, and perhaps of probable uses in the near future. Rex v. Marion County, 15 Or LUBA 293 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. City's "judicial notice" of prior city approvals does not encompass supporting evidence submitted during the prior proceedings. McNulty v. City of Lake Oswego, 15 Or LUBA 283 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where an ordinance provision is unambiguous, LUBA will not go beyond its plain language to create additional standards based upon speculation about legislative intent. Wagner v. Marion County, 15 Or LUBA 260 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where the property petitioners wished the county to accept as a county road was not offered for dedication in the subdivision plat, approval of the subdivision did not constitute acceptance of the roadway. Kegg v. Clackamas County, 15 Or LUBA 239 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where city ordinance imposed standard that there be no "objectionable conditions" associated with the proposed development, a city interpretation of this standard to allow consideration o f demands the use would impose on public safety services was reasonable, and a city finding that the proposal would overburden the city's police protection services is a proper basis for denial of the development application. Texaco, Inc. v. King City, 15 Or LUBA 198 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where the text of an ordinance is clear, but the description of the text in an order applying the ordinance is incorrect, the text of the ordinance will control. Texaco, Inc. v. King City, 15 Or LUBA 198 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where an ordinance can reasonably be interpreted in several ways, the interpretation by the body responsible for enacting it should control, especially where its interpretation is consistent with the ordinance as a whole. Texaco, Inc. v. King City, 15 Or LUBA 198 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. The term "automobile service station" is ambiguous, and therefore susceptible to more than one reasonable interpretation. Texaco, Inc. v. King City, 15 Or LUBA 198 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A plan statement that "one aspect of flood plain management involves balancing the economic gain from flood plain development against the increase in flood hazard" need not be read as a plan policy or an approval standard. Storey v. City of Stayton, 15 Or LUBA 165 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Applicable plan policies which refer to "vacant lands within the corporate city limits" and "the city's useable land" require the city to consider all undeveloped land in the city, not just land in a single zoning district. Storey v. City of Stayton, 15 Or LUBA 165 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Ordinance provisions requiring conformity with the comprehensive plan generally and with specific plan provisions listed in the ordinance require consideration of the entire comprehensive plan. Storey v. City of Stayton, 15 Or LUBA 165 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Plan policy calling for referral of land use applications to agencies providing services to subject area does not suggest that the county loses jurisdiction over the application if the affected agencies are not notified, the policy is interpreted as a procedural requirement. Lane County School Dist. 71 v. Lane County, 15 Or LUBA 150 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Ordinance provision requiring governing body to request a report and recommendation from the planning commission before taking action on a comprehensive plan amendment will not be interpreted as applying to a plan amendment which has been remanded to the governing body from a reviewing body such as LUBA. Lane County School Dist. 71 v. Lane County, 15 Or LUBA 150 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Plan policy requiring proposed recreational uses to be compatible with surrounding development is not met by findings addressing compatibility only with adjacent EFU-zoned agricultural land. Leonard v. Union County, 15 Or LUBA 135 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Statutes allowing preexisting uses to continue after restrictive regulations are adopted do not permit expansion of the preexisting use. Cantrell v. Wasco County, 15 Or LUBA 127 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where city ordinance distinguishes between "conventional subdivision" and "mobile home subdivision" but does not define either term, city refusal to redesignate a subdivision which included a conventionally built home to a mobile home subdivision was proper. Joy v. City of Talent, 15 Or LUBA 115 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a prior major partitioning included [in] a condition limiting the number of dwellings on a parcel, a division of the parcel will not defeat the prior condition. Endresen v. Marion County, 15 Or LUBA 60 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A county may consider the effect of partition applications against possible future applications under a criterion requiring that a nonfarm dwelling "not materially alter the stability of the overall land use pattern of the area." Endresen v. Marion County, 15 Or LUBA 60 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A finding that a proposed dwelling will have an adverse impact on farming or forest practices requires an explanation of the alleged adverse impact. Endresen v. Marion County, 15 Or LUBA 60 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A nonfarm dwelling may be sited on land generally not suitable for farm use although a majority of the parcel is suitable for farm use. The county should review the whole parcel for farm use suitability but may not insist the whole parcel be found unsuitable for farm use. Endresen v. Marion County, 15 Or LUBA 60 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Decisionmaker's requirement of a "heightened burden of proof" because of the magnitude of the requested change does not render proceeding constitutionally defective. City of Wilsonville v. Metropolitan Service District, 15 Or LUBA 44 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Denial of a requested zone change is not a de facto amendment of the comprehensive plan. Robert Randall Company v. City of Wilsonville, 15 Or LUBA 26 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a city plan designates particular geographic areas as "areas of special concern" to which special design criteria apply, the city must identify the area of special concern within which the affected property lies and the particular criteria to be applied. Robert Randall Company v. City of Wilsonville, 15 Or LUBA 26 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a city code does not state clearly that either "objectives" or "policies" must be satisfied but only requires compliance with comprehensive plan generally, a decision may be based on consideration of both plan "objectives" and "policies." Robert Randall Company v. City of Wilsonville, 15 Or LUBA 26 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a city comprehensive plan provides a method to resolve conflict between plan provisions, LUBA will sustain a city's reasonable interpretation utilizing the plan policy. Robert Randall Company v. City of Wilsonville, 15 Or LUBA 26 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where city ordinance required that a structure be "complementary" to the "built environment" and the "natural environment," the city's findings stating only conclusions that the temple design meets the standard are not sufficient. McNulty v. City of Lake Oswego, 15 Or LUBA 16 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a provision of city's building design standard is not clear and unambiguous, LUBA may defer to a local government interpretation which is reasonable and not contrary to the ordinance. McNulty v. City of Lake Oswego, 15 Or LUBA 16 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where governing body is not required to take action on an urban renewal amendment, LUBA will consider the amendment procedure to be legislative in nature. Union Station Business Community Association v. City of Portland, 15 Or LUBA 4 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. ORS 197.835(8)(a)(C) authorizes relief where the decision is unsupported by substantial evidence, but does not require that there be substantial evidence addressing "issues" raised during permit hearings. Oatfield Ridge Residents Rights v. Clackamas County, 14 Or LUBA 766 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Statutes authorizing creation of parcels for nonfarm dwellings must be read in conjunction with ORS 215.243(3), which states a policy of preserving the maximum amount of agricultural land in large blocks. Hearne v. Baker County, 14 Or LUBA 743 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A code provision allowing modification of off-street parking requirements if "substantially equal protection to the surrounding properties is afforded," requires consideration of the number of spaces and their location. Callahan v. City of Portland, 14 Or LUBA 678 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where city parking regulation requires "legal evidence * * * that property is and will remain available for use as off-street parking space," an agreement permitting the parking space owner to cancel at will does not meet the regulation requirement. Callahan v. City of Portland, 14 Or LUBA 678 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. The date the county mails statutorily required written notice of a permit decision is the date the decision becomes final for purposes of tolling the 21-day period of appeal under ORS 197.830(7). Bainbridge v. Lane County, 14 Or LUBA 546 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Although ORS 197.015(10) empowers a "local government" to make land use decisions, LUBA interprets ORS 215.050 and ORS 215.060 to grant exclusive responsibility for comprehensive plan adoption and amendments to county governing bodies rather than county planning commissioners or hearings officers. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Washington County, 14 Or LUBA 416 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A county comprehensive plan map amendment is not a "contested case" within the meaning of ORS 215.402(1) which can be decided by a planning commission under ORS 215.406. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Washington County, 14 Or LUBA 416 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a city comprehensive plan is ambiguous on question of whether a variance from a restriction may be allowed, the city's interpretation that a variance is allowable can be sustained if it is not clearly contradictory to the express language and intent of the plan. Downtown Community Association v. City of Portland, 14 Or LUBA 382 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where comprehensive plan calculates parking spaces in mixed-use building based on floor area for office uses in the building, city cannot approve the parking spaces while allowing developer the option of not constructing the office-use component of the building. Downtown Community Association v. City of Portland, 14 Or LUBA 382 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Where a component of a city's comprehensive plan expresses parking ratio regulations in unambiguous, mandatory language, LUBA will not interpret these regulations as advisory despite other references to the ratios as "guidelines." Downtown Community Association v. City of Portland, 14 Or LUBA 382 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A city is not required to read a comprehensive plan goal in isolation, but may balance one goal with another in determining whether a project complies with the comprehensive plan. Downtown Community Association v. City of Portland, 14 Or LUBA 382 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Greenway policy in ORS 390.314 does not limit intensification of land use to "existing residential, commercial and agricultural uses" but rather declares the necessity of restriction on all development within the Greenway to preserve its "natural, scenic, historical and recreational qualities." Urquhart v. LCOG and City of Eugene, 14 Or LUBA 335 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. An airstrip used by the owner as a base for owner's one airplane used in owner's logging business is a personal use airport as defined in ORS 215.213(2)(h). Todd v. Douglas County, 14 Or LUBA 307 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. A City's reasonable interpretation of its comprehensive plan will be upheld. Hannon v. Gresham, 14 Or LUBA 192 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. ORS 215.416(8) requires only that county standards for approval or denial of a permit application be clear enough for an applicant to know what must be shown during the application process. Columbia River Television v. Marion County, 14 Or LUBA 179 (1986).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Plan policies which prescribe performance or evaluation standards for specific actions or projects must be applied in the review of subdivision applications; county cannot disregard such plan policies on grounds zoning ordinance defines lands subject to regulation. McCoy v. Tillamook County, 14 Or LUBA 108 (1985).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Not all segments of a plan are intended to serve as decision making criteria. The legal effect of particular plan language depends largely on the text itself. McCoy v. Tillamook County, 14 Or LUBA 108 (1985).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Statute permitting a dwelling "customarily provided in conjunction with farm use" requires a showing that the dwelling will be sited on a parcel wholly devoted to farm use. Matteo v. Polk County, 14 Or LUBA 67 (1985).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. LUBA will not read comprehensive plan and implementing ordinances to have retroactive effect without some provision in the plan and ordinances suggesting such a reading is required. Warren v. Lane County, 14 Or LUBA 36 (1985).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law. Zone change criterion requiring that proposed mining site be in closest proximity to utilization area is not impermissibly vague and does not require refinement before it can be applied in decision making process. Panner v. Deschutes County, 14 Or LUBA 1 (1985).

Administrative Law – Statutory Interpretation – Clinic. In the absence of a statement of reasons explaining why the facts found led the county to conclude that a sole practitioner's dental office constituted "a clinic" within the meaning of the county's ordinance, it could not be said that the county correctly applied its ordinance. Theland v. Multnomah County, 4 Or LUBA 284 (1981).

Administrative Law – Statutory Interpretation – Delegative Term. The court's function on review of an agency's refinement of delegative terms is to ascertain whether the refinement and application to specific facts falls within the generally expressed policy of the statute. Theland v. Multnomah County, 4 Or LUBA 284 (1981).

Administrative Law – Statutory Interpretation – Inexact Term – Findings. When dealing with an inexact term, the reasoning of the agency as to what a particular term means and why a particular set of facts falls within the "compass" of the term must, in a contested case proceeding, be set forth in the agency's order. Theland v. Multnomah County, 4 Or LUBA 284 (1981).

Administrative Law – Interpretation of Statutory Terms – Classes of Terms. The responsibility of a judicial or quasi-judicial body in the review of administrative decisions requiring interpretation of statutory terms hinges on whether the term is a "term of precise meaning," an "inexact term," or a "term of delegation." Theland v. Multnomah County, 4 Or LUBA 284 (1981).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a city's minimum lot size requirements are based, in part, upon a code provision which requires a measurement of a lot's "slope," and the city interprets the term "slope" to be determined using post-development grades, rather than pre-development grades, LUBA will uphold the city's interpretation as "plausible" subject to Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), where the city found that "slope" is an ambiguous term, and the city interprets the term in a manner consistent with its interpretation of the text and in context of historical application of the code provision. An ambiguous code provision term is one with more than one possible construction of the term, and the local government interprets such a term in a "plausible" manner when read consistently with the express language of the code, as read in context. Estroff v. City of Dundee, 79 Or LUBA 189 (2019).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a code provision states that the "provisions of this code shall be interpreted as minimum requirements. When this code imposes a greater restriction than is required by other provisions of law * * * the provisions of this code shall control," and petitioners argue that the city erred in applying the least restrictive, rather than the most restrictive interpretation of the city's code requirement that minimum lot size be determined by "slope," by allowing project applicants to measure slope after grading, rather than before grading, to maximize their potential minimum developable lot size, but petitioners do not identify what other provision of law imposes a lesser restriction as regards to minimum lot size that the city should have applied, petitioners have not provided a basis for reversal or remand. Estroff v. City of Dundee, 79 Or LUBA 189 (2019).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Even if a local government's interpretation of its code were less plausible than petitioners' preferred interpretation, the "existence of a stronger or more logical interpretation does not render a weaker or less logical interpretation 'implausible' under the Siporen[v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010),] standard." Mark Latham Excavation, Inc. v. Deschutes County, 250 Or App 543, 555, 281 P3d 644 (2012). Estroff v. City of Dundee, 79 Or LUBA 189 (2019).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a local code provision prohibits uses that "alter the character of the surrounding area in a manner that substantially limits, impairs, or precludes the use of surrounding properties," a hearings officer errs in reducing the inquiry into a single inquiry into whether the proposed use makes the use of nearby properties "substantially worse," since the words "limit" and "impair" have different meanings and since, where a local code uses two different terms in the same provision, it is presumed that the enacting body intends two different meanings. York v. Clackamas County, 79 Or LUBA 278 (2019).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a local code provision prohibits a "[p]layground, recreation facility or community center owned and operated by a government agency or nonprofit community organization," a local governing body does not misconstrue the provision by interpreting the phrase "owned and operated by a government agency or nonprofit community organization" as applying to each antecedent rather than just to the last antecedent, community centers, and therefore as permitting a private recreation facility in the zone, where (1) the provision's language implements state law, which is concerned only with public facilities, (2) the code sets out a separate use category for "recreation-oriented facility," and (3) the local government has historically viewed the provision to encompass only public facilities. Bishop v. Deschutes County, 79 Or LUBA 380 (2019).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will affirm as correct a city planning commission's interpretation that a city code provision that prohibits "grading" on portions of a site that contains steep slopes does not prohibit all development activities that disturb soil, where the city's code does not define the terms "grading" and "excavating," but does define "development" as including both "grading" and "excavating" as separate terms. LUBA will affirm the city planning commission's conclusion that the grading prohibition is not violated by a PUD site plan that requires digging holes to install support posts for cantilevered dwellings and digging and refilling trenches to install water lines in areas containing steep slopes because those activities constitute excavation and not grading. Fairmount Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 78 Or LUBA 418 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the city's code provides that development application materials "shall reflect that consideration has been given to [tree] preservation," the city does not err in finding that the code requirement is met when the applicant's submissions demonstrate that consideration was given to tree preservation through a tree survey and site design that preserves trees within a stand on slopes greater than 25 percent, contains yard sizes that decrease critical root zone impacts, and preserves trees between and around homes. Those application materials reflect that consideration was given to tree preservation even though some high and moderate priority trees must be removed to develop streets, utilities and building pads, and preservation of trees on residential lots would be left to the discretion of future lot owners. The code does not require the actual preservation of trees; instead, the code requires a project applicant to consider tree preservation and submit evidence to demonstrate that such consideration occurred. Fairmount Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 78 Or LUBA 418 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Extension and improvement of a residential access road over an existing public right-of-way is not subject to a city code section that requires streets that are "dedicated to the public by the applicant * * * conform" with adopted street right-of-way maps. A proposed improvement of a type of street that is not depicted on the city's adopted street right-of-way map does not fail to "conform" with that map. Fairmount Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 78 Or LUBA 418 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. That different setbacks standards with different language are interpreted to require the same setback distance does not run afoul of the general interpretative requirement to give different effect to different words used in the same statute, where the local government shows that the different words nevertheless support requiring the same setback distance. Brannon v. Multnomah County, 77 Or LUBA 275 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will deny a petitioner's challenge to a county board of commissioners' conclusion that a marijuana production project applicant had satisfied the requirement to provide proof that water is available to the property by providing a "statement that water is supplied from a public or private water provider," by providing a letter from a private company stating it would supply water to the property where petitioner argues the letter is insufficient because the private water provider does not hold a water right. Based on its plain language, the county code does not require such a statement, but only requires a statement from a "private water provider" that they will provide water for the operation. King v. Deschutes County, 77 Or LUBA 339 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Generally. LUBA will deny petitioner's challenge that the provider of water must have "an authorized source of water under Oregon Water Law" where county code requires an applicant for marijuana production to provide proof that water is available to the property by providing a statement that "water is supplied from a public or private water provider," the county code does not further define "provider of water," and the county imposed a condition of approval requiring "the use of water from any source for marijuana production shall comply with all applicable state statutes and regulations including ORS 537.545 and OAR 690-340-0010." King v. Deschutes County, 77 Or LUBA 339 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local government does not misinterpret the term "substation" by interpreting it to be an example of the use category "utilities" that is broad enough to include a wireless transmission tower. And it does not matter that the wireless transmission tower is a cell tower and that there were no cell towers in 1984 when the legislation defining substation and utilities was adopted. There were radio transmission and communication towers in 1984, which are similar to cell towers, and it is not unusual for new uses to come into existence and fall into existing broad use categories. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local governing body's conclusion—that the general category of utility "[d]istribution plants and substations" adopted in 1984 is broad enough to include a wireless transmission tower—is not inconsistent with contemporary and other dictionary definitions of "distribution," "plant" and "substation." Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local governing body does not err by refusing to view the term "distribution plants and substations" as a technical term or term of art. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When a local government adopts a new rule of interpretation it is not limited to applying that new rule of interpretation to subsequently enacted legislation. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. ORS 215.750 and OAR 660-006-005(5) allow a county to approve a forest template dwelling if, after applying a 160-acre template centered on the subject property, at least 11 other "lots or parcels that existed on January 1, 1993, are" within the 160-acre area. A hearings officer's finding that the applicant met the 11-lot requirement by counting three parcels with boundaries that were later reconfigured pursuant to property line adjustment after January 1, 1993, as long as the parcels as they existed on January 1, 1993 were "partly or completely within the template boundaries," and counting a fourth parcel that was partitioned into two parcels after January 1, 1993 as one parcel is consistent with the statute and the rule, where the administrative rule history of OAR 660-006-0005(5) indicates the Land Conservation and Development Commission (LCDC) did not intend to prohibit an applicant from relying on the January 1, 1993 configuration of a later-reconfigured parcel so long as "the effect of" later properly line adjustments was not "to qualify a lot, parcel or tract for the siting of a dwelling." Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 75 Or LUBA 151 (2017).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A 1983 Oregon Department of Land Conservation and Development (DLCD) memorandum stamped "preliminary draft subject to revision" is not competent legislative history LUBA can rely on in determining the intent of the legislature in enacting a statute. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 75 Or LUBA 258 (2017).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will reject an interpretation of a county Wildlife Area overlay zone, which implements Statewide Planning Goal 5 to protect winter range in part by prohibiting new churches in winter range, to the effect that the WA overlay zone prohibits churches in winter range areas only where the underlying base zone categorizes churches as a conditional use, but that interpretation would allow churches in winter range areas if the underlying base zone categorizes churches as something other than a conditional use, given that conflicts between churches and winter range are the same whether churches are categorized as permitted or conditional uses. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 284 (2017).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A hearings officer Misconstrues the text and context of a county's Wildlife Area (WA) overlay zone, in concluding that prohibitions on certain new uses, including churches, in winter range areas are limited exclusively to areas where the underlying base zone categorizes such uses as conditional uses, where other provisions of the WA overlay zone make it clear that the prohibition on new uses in winter range is not limited to uses categorized as conditional uses in the underlying base zone. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 284 (2017).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. An amendment to require that vacation rental dwellings must have at least one parking place per bedroom does not conflict with the zoning ordinance's requirement that all residences must have two parking places, where the text and context of the zoning ordinance and amendment make it clear that the one parking space per bedroom requirement applies only to residences that are used as a vacation rental dwelling. Whittemore v. City of Gearhart, 75 Or LUBA 374 (2017).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the text of a county comprehensive plan policy limits redevelopment of areas developed as golf courses or designated open space or common area within a resort, but includes no language prohibiting redevelopment of other areas within the resort, interpreting the policy to implicitly prohibit new residential development anywhere within the resort would impermissibly insert what has been omitted pursuant to ORS 174.010, and may not survive even the deferential review required under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Kine v.

Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 419 (2017).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. OAR 660-033-0140(1) provides that a discretionary permit on resource land is void two years from the date of the final decision "if the development action is not initiated within that period." However, reading OAR 660-033-0140(1) to allow the permit approval to remain valid indefinitely once it is initiated within the two-year period is inconsistent with OAR 660-033-0140(2), which allows an extension for one year if the applicant was unable to begin or "continue development during the approval period." The requirement to show that the application was unable to "continue development during the approval period" indicates that simply initiating the development within the two-year period is not sufficient in itself to render the permit valid indefinitely, without the need to seek an extension. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 74 Or LUBA 299 (2016).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Interpreting OAR 660-033-0140(1) to allow a discretionary permit approval to remain valid indefinitely once it is initiated within the initial two-year approval period is inconsistent with OAR 660-033-0140(4), which provides that additional extensions beyond one year may be authorized where applicable criteria have not changed. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 74 Or LUBA 299 (2016).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will reject a proposed interpretation of a city code site review provision that would broadly apply to all proposed needed housing, including single-family dwellings, and result in imposition of discretionary standards and lengthy procedures that could easily have the effect of discouraging needed housing, contrary to ORS 197.307(4), where there is an alternative interpretation that harmonizes the relevant text and context and does not force the city's code into conflict with ORS 197.307(4). McCollough v. City of Eugene, 74 Or LUBA 573 (2016).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a city's code offers a path for developers to qualify proposed housing as "needed housing," in order to obtain waiver of certain standards that would otherwise apply, LUBA will similarly interpret a related code provision requiring that site review provisions be applied when "the application proposes needed housing," to the effect that the site review provisions apply only if the applicant seeks to qualify the proposed housing as "needed housing." McCollough v. City of Eugene, 74 Or LUBA 573 (2016).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA's conclusion that a planning commission's procedural error in failing to grant the continuance or open record period dictated by ORS 197.763(6)(a) through (c) provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the city council took corrective action to avoid prejudice to petitioner's substantial rights, does not improperly insert missing text into a development code that duplicates ORS 197.763(6)(a) through (c). Pinnacle Alliance Group, LLC v. City of Sisters, 73 Or LUBA 169 (2016).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A development ordinance that links the terms "mining" and "quarrying" suggests the term "mining" should not be limited to removal of minerals that exclude rock, where dictionary definitions of "quarrying" frequently define that term to include rock removal. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a development code states that "minerals" include three general categories: solids, liquids, and gases, but these general categories are followed by specific examples: "coal and ores," "crude petroleum" and "natural gases," the rule of statutory construction ejusdem generis lends some support for interpreting the word "minerals" to be a narrow category of precious and/or valuable substances, as opposed to mere rock or aggregate. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a development code definition of the term "excavation" separately lists removal of "minerals" and "rock" as possible examples of "excavation," that suggests "minerals" and "rock" are different things and that "minerals" do not include "rock." S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a development code definition of "surface mining" duplicates a statute that defines "surface mining" to include mining of "minerals," without expressly incorporating the broad statutory definition of "minerals" or the statutory exceptions to that broad definition of "minerals" the development code definition of "surface mining" lends some support to the position that the enactors of the development code intended the word "minerals" to have a more narrow meaning than the statutory definition of that term. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. One possible inference when a development code definition of "surface mining" duplicates a statute that defines "surface mining" to include mining of "minerals," is that the enactors of the development code intended the word "minerals" to have its statutory meaning, even if the enactors did not expressly incorporate the broad statutory definition of "minerals" or the statutory exceptions to that broad definition of "minerals" into the development code. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. There is nothing inherently inappropriate about a local government distinguishing between acceptable excavations that are necessary for development and excavations that are of a nature and extent that constitutes mining. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. While dictionaries are not always a reliable way to determine the intended meaning of an undefined term like "minerals," where the development codes expressly directs that undefined terms "have the normal dictionary meaning" it is appropriate to rely on dictionary definitions to interpret the word "minerals" to include basalt rock. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. ORS 197.770, which provides that existing firearms training facilities may continue, is silent regarding the expansion of an existing firearms training facility. Because the statute is silent on expansion, it does not prohibit expansion, if expansion is otherwise authorized and consistent with other applicable law. H.T. Rea Farming Corp. v. Umatilla County, 71 Or LUBA 125 (2015).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. While a county governing body cannot be faulted for not considering dictionary definitions that were not cited to it below, the county governing body can be faulted for relying on a general on-line dictionary definition of "penstock," when a party asserted that term has a technical meaning and cited two treatises in support its position that the term has a narrower meaning that the on-line general dictionary definition. Pacificorp v. Deschutes County, 70 Or LUBA 89 (2014).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Generally use of the same phrase in different provisions of the same statute indicates that the phrase has the same meaning. Because ORS 197.772(1) uses the term "property owner" to refer to the property owner at the time that the property is designated a historic resource, the use of the same term in ORS 197.772(3), which allows a property owner to request removal of the designation, suggests that "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) refers to the owner at the time of designation, not subsequent purchasers of the property. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Notwithstanding that ORS 197.772(1) and (3) both use the same phrase "property owner," the two sub-sections operate in entirely different, non-overlapping circumstances, which suggests that "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) may not be limited by context, as is ORS 197.772(1), to the property owner at the time property is designated a historic resource. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where legislative history of ORS 197.772(3) indicates that the legislators proposing that section believed the phrase "property owner" as used in that provision referred only to the property owner at the time property was designated for historic resource, and did not include subsequent purchasers, and an amendment intended to specify that "property owner" also included subsequent purchasers was later deleted in conference, the strongest inference is that the legislature intended "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) to include only the property owner at the time of designation, and not subsequent purchasers. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where legislative history of ORS 197.772(3) indicates that legislators intended to offer remedial relief to property owners who were "coerced" into having their property designated as a historic resource, but the legislative history does not indicate that the legislature was equally concerned with subsequent purchasers who acquire the property knowing it is designated as a historic resource, that legislative history supports the conclusion that "property owner" as used in ORS 197.772(3) is limited to owners at the time the property was designated, not subsequent purchasers. Lake Oswego Preservation Society v. City of Lake Oswego, 70 Or LUBA 103 (2014).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Legislative Counsel's decision to renumber as ORS 215.284(1) to (6) what the legislature enacted as ORS 215.283(3) to (8) does not change the fact that what is now codified at ORS 215.284(1) to (6) was enacted by the legislature as part of ORS 215.283 and 215.283. ORS 215.283 is the statutory regime that applies to non-marginal lands counties rather than marginal lands counties. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 70 Or LUBA 325 (2014).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A comprehensive plan provision is ambiguous if it can be interpreted in more than one way. Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 76 (2013).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A comprehensive plan policy that requires the city to extend "key urban services and facilities in an orderly and efficient manner" is relevant context for interpreting a comprehensive plan provision that requires the local government to design and locate public and private facilities such as cellular communications towers in a manner that "preserves and enhances desirable features of local and neighborhood areas" and "promotes their sense of identity," where the two policies deal with the same subject matter. Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 76 (2013).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A standard that requires mitigation of permanent disturbances to wetlands is not properly construed to apply to the entirety of a parcel that contains a wetland area, such that the standard is applied to disturbances elsewhere on the parcel that have no impact on the wetland area. STOP Tigard Oswego Project, LLC v. City of West Linn, 68 Or LUBA 360 (2013).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. ORS 197.829(1)(d) effectively obligates a local government to interpret an ambiguous code provision if possible in a manner not contrary to the applicable statewide planning goals and administrative rules, not only where the code provision directly implements a goal or rule protecting resource lands, but also where the code provision is a general provision applicable to all zones, including resource zones, and is not intended to implement any particular goal or rule. White v. Lane County, 68 Or LUBA 423 (2013).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where one plan strategy directs that lands subject to flooding be designated "Floodplain" and the following plan strategy directs that no permanent structures may be erected in lands subject to flooding unless the structure complies with the "Floodplain" criteria, a local governing body's interpretation of those plan strategies to require application of the "Floodplain" criteria only in areas that have already been designated "Floodplain" runs afoul of ORS 174.010 by failing to "give effect" to the second strategy and by "inserting what has been omitted" in the second strategy by inserting a requirement that the lands subject to flooding must have been zoned "Floodplain." Friends of the Hood River Waterfront v. City of Hood River, 68 Or LUBA 459 (2013).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the language of a development code is such that it anticipates an application for declaratory ruling will be submitted by a single owner of a single property, the development code is therefore ambiguous regarding whether an application for a declaratory ruling is possible when the application concerns more than one property and is ambiguous regarding whether the application must be signed by all property owners or may be signed by any property owner. Gould v. Deschutes County, 67 Or LUBA 1 (2013).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a zoning ordinance would allow a VA outpatient clinic use as "Government Services" uses only if the use is not "specifically listed" uses in other zoning districts, and the zoning ordinance authorizes "Medical Health Facilities" in other zoning districts, the critical question is whether authorizing "Medical Health Facilities" in those other zones is sufficient to "specifically list" the proposed VA outpatient clinic use. In resolving that question, the maxim of statutory construction in ORS 174.020 that calls for selection of a particular provision over a more general provision where they conflict is of no particular assistance. Randazzo v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 272 (2012).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Construed in context with related code language and relevant statutes governing local appeals, a county's code is not correctly interpreted to bar non-applicant parties who participated in the evidentiary phase of a local permit proceeding from participating in an on-the-record appeal filed by the applicant to challenge permit conditions of approval. Families for a Quarry Free Neighborhood v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 297 (2011).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Post-enactment statements made by a currently serving member of a local decision making body who was also a member of a local legislative body at the time a land use regulation was enacted are not legislative history. Siegert v. Crook County, 63 Or LUBA 379 (2011).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Under Flying J. Inc. v. Marion County, 49 Or LUBA 28, 36-37, aff'd, 201 Or App 99, 117 P3d 1027 (2005), where the text of an ordinance that adopts zoning designation amendments expresses a clear intent that the prior zoning for a parcel be retained but the map attached to the ordinance shows a change in zoning, that conflict is resolved in favor of the text. Turner v. Jackson County, 62 Or LUBA 199 (2010).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where one sentence of a zoning ordinance provides that "any dispute" concerning the zoning of property is to be resolved by reference to the official zoning map, but that sentence appears immediately after a sentence that states that initial zoning boundary determinations are to be made based on maps generated by the local government's GIS system, those sentences should be read together to require that any disputes that arise based on the GIS maps or facts that arise after the zoning ordinance was adopted be resolved in favor of the official zoning map. But those sentences of the zoning ordinance do not require that a text/map conflict in the enacting zoning ordinance itself be resolved in favor of the official zoning map, where it is clear the new zoning shown for a property on the official zoning map was a mistake, and the text of the enacting ordinance clearly states that the zoning of the property was not changed by the ordinance. Turner v. Jackson County, 62 Or LUBA 199 (2010).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The inference described in Sarti v. City of Lake Oswego, 20 Or LUBA 387, rev'd, 106 Or App 594, 809 P2d 701 (1991)—that provision for a specific listed use in one zone precludes that use from being authorized in a different zone under a broader use category—has no role in reviewing local government code interpretations under ORS 197.829(1), where the proper question is whether the interpretation is consistent with the text and context of the code language. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. An interpretation of a city landslide hazard regulation that gives no effect to the main clause of the regulation and only gives effect to the subordinate clause arguably runs afoul of the interpretive principle embodied in ORS 174.010, which prohibits interpreting statutes in a way that omits statutory language that has been included in the statute. Gravatt v. City of Portland, 62 Or LUBA 382 (2011).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where one section of a zoning ordinance permits the city engineer to approve more than one driveway access to lots and parcels "subject to access requirements," and another section of the zoning ordinance setting out the city's access requirements generally prohibits direct access to arterials where a lot or parcel already has access to a lower category roadway, a city correctly denies the request for the direct arterial access. In that case the two sections of the zoning ordinance do not conflict; the contingent authority to grant more than one driveway is simply limited by the section setting out access requirements. Athletic Club of Bend, Inc. v. City of Bend, 61 Or LUBA 349 (2010).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Land use regulations that simply require that permit applications comply with "applicable" provisions in the land use regulations are frequently ambiguous, since they require an unguided review of the land use regulations to determine which provisions are "applicable." Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The applicability of a local government's land use regulations, viewed in isolation, may be unambiguous. However, when those same land use regulations are viewed in context with others parts of the local government's land use regulations, the applicability of those land use regulations may be qualified or limited. Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local governing body's interpretation of its land use regulations to limit the scope of review of a site plan and architectural review committee is inconsistent with the text of the land use regulations where the governing body ignores and fails to give effect to land use regulation text that is inconsistent with its interpretation. Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local government's interpretation of its land use regulations to limit application of (1) its land use regulation's requirement for preparation of a transportation impact analysis and (2) its minimum level of service standard to zone change decisions and certain planned unit development decisions cannot be sustained, where the text of the relevant land use regulation sections is inconsistent with that interpretation. Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a comprehensive plan in one instance says the city's level of service standard applies to zone changes, but does not state that the standard applies exclusively to zone changes, and in another instance the comprehensive plan states that the level of service standard applies when changing land use designations and to development, the comprehensive plan text does not support the city's ultimate interpretation that the level of service standard applies only to zone changes. Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local ordinance providing that use of a verb in the present tense includes the future tense is not controlling where the disputed term is used as an adjective that does not convey a tense or refer to a past completed action. Paddock v. City of Lafayette, 58 Or LUBA 498 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When an applicable local provision requires that road improvements associated with a partition be constructed or bonded for "before a dwelling may be authorized," the local governments errs by requiring the improvements to be constructed or bonded for as a condition of approval of the partition itself. Sperber v. Coos County, 58 Or LUBA 570 (2009).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a county attempts to take advantage of the riparian corridor safe harbor authorized by OAR 660-023-0090(8) but defines "water dependent" and "water related" slightly differently than the statewide planning goal definitions of those terms, any ambiguity created by the different wording must be resolved consistently with the statewide planning goal definitions. Johnson v. Jefferson County, 56 Or LUBA 25 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Exclusive farm use and forest zoned lands are subject to statutory minimum parcel sizes. A generally applicable zoning ordinance definition of "lot size" that would allow internal rights-of-way to be included in computing lot size is not necessarily inconsistent with the statutory minimum parcel size requirements where the statutes are silent about how to treat internal rights-of-way. If it turns out that internal rights-of-way must be excluded when applying statutory minimum parcel size requirements in exclusive farm use and forest zoned lands, the statutory requirement would have to be satisfied notwithstanding the general zoning ordinance definition. Johnson v. Jefferson County, 56 Or LUBA 25 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Under ORS 197.445(4), destination resorts must provide at least 150 units of "overnight lodging." Where a zoning ordinance that was adopted to implement ORS 197.445(4) is ambiguous, such that the zoning ordinance could be interpreted to be inconsistent with ORS 197.445(4) or consistent with ORS 197.445(4), the county would be required to interpret the zoning ordinance to be consistent with ORS 197.445(4). Johnson v. Jefferson County, 56 Or LUBA 72 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. ORS 197.445(5) limits commercial uses to "types and levels of use necessary to meet the needs of visitors" to destination resorts. A zoning ordinance that allows "commercial and entertainment" uses in destination resorts is likely consistent with ORS 197.445(5) since entertainment uses are likely to be commercial uses. But if an entertainment use were proposed that was not a commercial use, the county would be obligated to interpret the term entertainment consistently with ORS 197.445(5) and deny the proposed entertainment use. Johnson v. Jefferson County, 56 Or LUBA 72 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a zoning ordinance amendment that potentially allowed more individual lots or units in a destination resort than permitted under applicable statutes at the time the zoning ordinance amendment was adopted, the decision need not be remanded where the statute was subsequently amended to allow the number of individual lots or units authorized by the zoning ordinance amendment. Johnson v. Jefferson County, 56 Or LUBA 72 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. ORS 197.445(1) requires a minimum site size of 160 acres for destination resorts. A zoning ordinance that allows internal rights-of-way to be included in determining whether a proposed destination resort complies with the ORS 197.445(1) 160-acre minimum site size does not violate the statute, because ORS 197.445(1) does not expressly require that rights-of-way be excluded when computing site size and even if the statute did require that rights-of-way be excluded, the statutory requirement would have to be satisfied. Johnson v. Jefferson County, 56 Or LUBA 72 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The purpose of a zoning limitation that commercial development in a specified area should consist of "retail that is small in scale" could be to limit floor space area and it could also be to require that commercial uses have "a small or local market area." Loprinzi's Gym v. City of Portland, 56 Or LUBA 358 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where zoning ordinance commentary states that the purpose of a zoning ordinance limitation is to encourage "a local scale of retail," and encourage businesses that are "local serving rather than providing a regional draw," a city does not err in finding that the purpose of a zoning regulation that limits commercial uses to 10,000 square feet is to encourage locally oriented businesses rather than businesses of any particular size. Loprinzi's Gym v. City of Portland, 56 Or LUBA 358 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Findings in support of an adjustment to a 10,000-square-foot maximum floor space limit to allow a 33,000-square-foot health club are inadequate to demonstrate that granting the adjustment will "equally or better" meet the purpose of the adjusted regulation, where the purpose of the adjusted regulation is to assure the resulting business is "locally serving" and the findings offer no working explanation of what the city thinks "locally serving" means and the findings do not address the "equally or better" requirement at all. Loprinzi's Gym v. City of Portland, 56 Or LUBA 358 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A zoning ordinance provision that simply says duplexes and triplexes may be allowed through a Type I (nondiscretionary) procedure if certain specified nondiscretionary standards are met is not properly interpreted to render inapplicable other apparently applicable nondiscretionary approval criteria. Tallman v. City of Bend, 56 Or LUBA 398 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A checklist prepared by a city's planning department to identify which criteria apply when approving a duplex or triplex does not render apparently applicable zoning criteria that are not identified on the checklist inapplicable to an application for approval of a duplex. It is the zoning ordinance that determines which standards apply, not the checklist. Tallman v. City of Bend, 56 Or LUBA 398 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When a local code provision prevents the filing of the same or "substantially similar" application within a certain time period after a previous application is denied, the plain ordinary meaning of "substantially similar" means that a second application is barred only when there is a high degree of similarity. Henkel v. Clackamas County, 56 Or LUBA 495 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a hearings official interprets a street connectivity standard to include a balancing test where the city would determine whether wetland values should take "precedence over the connectivity standards" or whether "it is more appropriate to meet the connectivity standards than to preserve wetlands," but the street connectivity standards themselves provide no textual support for that interpretation, LUBA will remand for a correct interpretation and application of the street connectivity standards. GloryBee Foods, Inc. v. City of Eugene, 56 Or LUBA 729 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a text and context analysis does not clearly answer an interpretive question, under PGE v. Bureau of Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 859 P2d 1143 (1993), it is appropriate to consider legislative history and maxims of statutory construction. Where there is no legislative history or relevant maxim of statutory construction, and the interpretive question therefore turns on which of several dictionary meanings of the term "preclude" should apply, LUBA will remand for the hearings officer to select the appropriate dictionary definition, considering other parts of the ambiguous zoning ordinance standard and other relevant context. GloryBee Foods, Inc. v. City of Eugene, 56 Or LUBA 729 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. To resolve conflicts between statutes, courts apply the legislative presumption that the more specific statute prevails over the more general statute, and may also apply a similar maxim of statutory construction, that where a conflict between two statutes cannot be reconciled, the later adopted statute prevails over the earlier statute. DLCD v. Jefferson County, 55 Or LUBA 625 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. In circumstances where the goal-post statute at ORS 215.427(3)(a) conflicts with Ballot Measure 37 (ORS 197.352), the latter prevails, because ORS 197.352 is the more specific and later-adopted statute. DLCD v. Jefferson County, 55 Or LUBA 625 (2008).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A comprehensive plan policy that uses the word "should" is generally not a mandatory approval criterion. Wolfgram v. Douglas County, 54 Or LUBA 54 (2007).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a zoning ordinance allows "roadside stands," that sell "agricultural produce," a land use hearings officer correctly applies the PGE v. Bureau of Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 610-12, 859 P2d 1143 (1993) template and the county zoning ordinance by applying dictionary definitions of "agricultural" and "produce" to conclude that a roadside stand may not include an espresso cart. The hearings officer correctly concluded from those definitions that while coffee beans are agricultural produce, espresso coffee drinks are not. Collver v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 147 (2007).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local government misconstrues its code when it finds that an ambiguity in the exhibits to an ordinance creates an inconsistency between the ordinance and the official zoning map. Brown v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 281 (2007).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When a land development ordinance requires multi-stage approvals and imposes time limits for securing approvals and filing additional applications, but does not suspend the time limits if individual stage approval decisions are appealed, a local government misinterprets its land development ordinance by introducing the concept of "initial" and "final" approval decisions for each stage to extend the deadlines for filing subsequent applications and securing subsequent stage approvals. Foland v. Jackson County, 54 Or LUBA 287 (2007).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the text of a city's development code only requires that the city not provide certain services in the absence of an annexation agreement, the city's interpretation of its code to allow it to require an annexation agreement at the time of partition approval, while not required by the text of the development code, is not inconsistent with the text of the development code. Wickham v. City of Grants Pass, 53 Or LUBA 261 (2007).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A city's interpretation of a development code provision to allow it to require execution of an annexation agreement at the time of partition, rather than waiting until the property is developed, is consistent with contextual development code provisions that require annexation agreements at the time of partition approval without regard to whether development is proposed at the time of partition approval. Wickham v. City of Grants Pass, 53 Or LUBA 261 (2007).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. As part of the textual analysis under PGE v. Bureau of Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 859 P2d 1143 (1993), Oregon courts apply a grammatical rule or presumption that modifying words or phrases refer only to the "last antecedent," the last preceding word, phrase or clause, and not earlier words or phrases in the sentence, where no contrary intent appears. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The purpose statement to a land use regulation is both context for interpreting that regulation as well as an explicit statement of its purpose. LUBA will reverse a governing body's interpretation of the regulation to allow residential uses that are prohibited by and therefore inconsistent with the purpose statement. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the purpose of an overlay zone is to allow non-recreational uses only when they are related to or support recreational uses, under ORS 197.829(1)(b) LUBA will reverse a governing body's interpretation that the zone allows unrestricted non-recreational uses regardless of whether those uses are related to or support recreational uses. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A hearings officer does not err in determining that specific provisions governing property line adjustments of undersize lots in agricultural zones apply to an agriculturally zoned portion of a split-zoned parcel, rather than general provisions governing property line adjustments requiring that adjusted lots satisfy the minimum parcel size. Bollam v. Clackamas County, 52 Or LUBA 738 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A code standard prohibiting a property line adjustment on agricultural land where the adjustment is used to qualify a lot or parcel for the siting of a dwelling does not preclude an adjustment that would effectively separate a split-zoned parcel to allow residential development on the non-agriculturally zoned portion of the parcel, where the adjustment will not qualify the agricultural portion of the parcel for a dwelling. Bollam v. Clackamas County, 52 Or LUBA 738 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Some caution is warranted in determining the intended scope of a term based on dictionary definitions, given the descriptive and all-inclusive nature of modern reference dictionaries. In many cases, the text and context of the code term may indicate that the governing body did not intend the term to encompass all possible dictionary meanings. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local government misconstrues its local code when it interprets the word "ownerships" to have different meanings in different parts of the code. Brown v. Lane County, 51 Or LUBA 689 (2006).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the text of an ordinance clearly demonstrates an intent not to rezone a particular area, but an attached map shows the area as rezoned, the text controls over the map. Flying J. Inc. v. Marion County, 49 Or LUBA 28 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a city's Master Plan Development District simply allows the uses that are permitted in certain other districts, the city erroneously interprets its code to allow those uses without the minimum lot size, minimum lot width, limit on building coverage, front or rear setback requirements or building height or any other standards or regulations that are applied to those uses in the other zoning districts. Those limitations from the other zoning districts apply unless the city applies the Master Plan Development District provision that allows the city to apply alternative standards in certain circumstances. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. City of Brookings, 49 Or LUBA 273 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Because ORS 215.130(11) does not unambiguously prohibit a county from requiring proof that a use was a lawful use when it came into existence more than 20 years ago or that it existed when the land use laws changed to prohibit the use, it is appropriate to consider legislative history of that statute. Aguilar v. Washington County, 49 Or LUBA 364 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The legislative history of ORS 215.130(11) makes clear that the statute operates to apply a 20-year proof limitation to any requirement of proof of existence as an element of continuity but it does not apply the 20-year limitation to any requirement of proof of existence, as an element of lawfulness at the time the use became nonconforming. Aguilar v. Washington County, 49 Or LUBA 364 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the text of a particular zoning district that allows permitted uses to be reviewed as conditional uses seems to call for a focus on the characteristics of the use itself, but the conditional use chapter of the zoning ordinance expressly provides that conditional uses may require special consideration due to unique site characteristics, the city does not err in interpreting the zoning district text to allow it to consider whether unique site characteristics justify treating the permitted use as a conditional use. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Central Point, 49 Or LUBA 472 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a local government approves a convention center, which is not listed as a permitted use in the applicable zone, but the use is expressly listed in another zone, the local government must address that "context" and explain how that context supports its conclusion that convention centers are allowed in the zone where they are not specifically listed. O'Shea v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 498 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a regulation specifically authorizes a use in one zone and does not authorize that specific use in a second zone, a more general authorization of uses in the second zone should not be interpreted to include the more specifically authorized use in the first zone. However, that principle would not apply to bar finding a particular feedlot qualifies as a "farm use" rather than a "commercial activity * * * in conjunction with farm use," where the legislature's authorization of "commercial activities that are in conjunction with farm use" is no more specific than its authorization of "farm uses." Friends of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 107 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will exercise its discretion under ORS 197.829(2) to interpret a comprehensive plan policy governing commercial zones to be inapplicable to a zone change to an industrial zone, notwithstanding that the proposed use is a commercial use, where the local government interpreted several similar plan policies to be inapplicable, and the context of the plan policy indicates that commercial uses in industrial zones are governed by industrial, not commercial, plan policies. Staus v. City of Corvallis, 48 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A county interpretation of its zoning ordinance to allow an existing manufactured dwelling to remain connected to the septic system that serves that existing dwelling, rather than to require the manufactured dwelling to be moved and connected to the septic system for the other dwelling on the property where the medical hardship is located is not inconsistent with the underlying purpose for medical hardship dwellings. In either case a second dwelling remains on the property for a specified period of time. Burton v. Polk County, 48 Or LUBA 440 (2005).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. In construing an initiative, a court attempts to discern the intent of the voters, based foremost on text and context of the initiative itself. While the chief petitioners may have intended that an initiative that preserves the city waterfront for a public park function as a mere straw poll on the future of the waterfront, the text and context of the initiative indicate that the voters intended to establish a binding policy effectively rezoning the city waterfront as a public park. The initiative is therefore a final, non-advisory decision for purposes of LUBA's jurisdiction. Port of Hood River v. City of Hood River, 47 Or LUBA 62 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When viewed alone, the word "within" in a code provision that requires that dwellings must be within a template area to be counted is ambiguous, because it could mean the dwelling must be at least partially within or it could mean the dwelling must be entirely within. However, where a related provision specifies that "all or part of" a parcel must be within the template, the failure to include the "all or part of" modifier provides contextual support for interpreting the provision without the modifier as requiring that the entire dwelling must be within the template area. Worman v. Multnomah County, 47 Or LUBA 410 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA's assumption that an ambiguous code provision should be interpreted in one way in a prior LUBA appeal where the correctness of that interpretation was not at issue is of extremely limited precedential value in a subsequent appeal where the correctness of that interpretation is at issue. Worman v. Multnomah County, 47 Or LUBA 410 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the local code provides a list of factors to be considered in order to demonstrate compliance with a mandatory approval criterion, preceded by the phrase, "evaluation factors include," the local government must consider the listed factors, or explain why particular factors need not be considered. Bauer v. City of Portland, 47 Or LUBA 459 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When a comprehensive plan has overlapping or conflicting policies, it is permissible for a local government to interpret them and apply them in a manner that balances those policies. Milne v. City of Canby, 46 Or LUBA 213 (2004).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Arbitrary and inconsistent interpretation of approval criteria in deciding applications for land use permits can provide a basis for reversal or remand; however where a city applies a plan policy to one kind of decision and does not apply it to another kind of decision, the differences in the two decisions can explain the different applications of the plan policy. Citizens for Env. Resp. Dev. v. City of Beaverton, 45 Or LUBA 378 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a city's interpretation that a broadcast radio tower may be allowed in a residential zoning district as a "private utility" and a "utility substation and related facilities" includes a number of erroneous interpretations of the city's zoning ordinance, but LUBA identifies a potentially sustainable interpretation of relevant zoning ordinance terms that would appear to permit approval of the radio tower, remand is nevertheless required where there are reasons why the city might not agree with LUBA's interpretation. Citizens for Env. Resp. Dev. v. City of Beaverton, 45 Or LUBA 378 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Generally, where a civil statute of limitation is changed to shorten the limitation period, the change is applied prospectively only. But where the statute is changed to lengthen the limitation period, the change applies both prospectively and retroactively. Applying that principle to ORS 215.417, forest template dwelling permits with a two-year duration that were issued before ORS 215.417 took effect, but which had not yet expired on the date ORS 215.417 took effect, must be honored for four years. Butori v. Clatsop County, 45 Or LUBA 553 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Although ORS 197.829(2) authorizes LUBA to interpret city zoning ordinances, where the city fails to do so and both petitioner and respondent present possible interpretations in their briefs that are plausible but both interpretations have problems, LUBA will remand the decision to the city so that it may address the interpretive issue in the first instance. Renaissance Development v. City of Lake Oswego, 45 Or LUBA 312 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. In considering whether a local government interpretation of a local provision is consistent with the express language of the provision under ORS 197.829(1), LUBA may consider the context of the provision. Bruce Packing Company v. City of Silverton, 45 Or LUBA 334 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A city's interpretation of comprehensive plan policies that apply to "residential development" as not applying to a proposed radio tower is not inconsistent with the language or apparent purpose of the policies and is therefore not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Citizens for Env. Resp. Dev. v. City of Beaverton, 45 Or LUBA 378 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A prerequisite for application of the deferential standard of review under ORS 197.829(1) is, at a minimum, a written decision or document adopted by the governing body that contains an express or implicit interpretation of a local provision that is adequate for review. A city attorney's interpretation of a local provision is not entitled to deference under that standard, even assuming that the city council informally directed the city attorney to apply that interpretation in denying the challenged building permits. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A zoning map that has a scale of one inch equals 800 feet is not of so gross a scale that it cannot be relied upon to locate a zoning boundary line on a 26-acre parcel. DLCD v. City of Gold Beach, 43 Or LUBA 319 (2002).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a local governing body interprets comprehensive plan provisions not to impose relevant approval criteria for a particular rezoning request it is entitled to great deference on review. However, where a local governing body simply declares that the provisions are not approval criteria without any explanation, the declaration expresses no reviewable interpretation and the declaration is not entitled to deference. Swyter v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 166 (2001).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Rural fire service facilities in EFU zones under ORS 215.283(1)(w) need not be separately approved as utility facilities necessary for public service under 215.283(1)(d) or meet the "necessity test" that is applied to such utility facilities. Keicher v. Clackamas County, 39 Or LUBA 521 (2001).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Nothing in the context of the term "kennel" as used in ORS 215.283(2)(m) demonstrates that the intended meaning of that term is narrower than the plain dictionary definition, which refers to establishments for the breeding and boarding of dogs. A proposal to breed and propagate dogs for sale is thus a "kennel" subject to county regulation and not a "farm use" allowed outright in an EFU zone. Tri-River Investment Co. v. Clatsop County, 37 Or LUBA 195 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where Metro has separate sources of statutory authority to adopt certain plans and to require that certain local planning actions be taken to conform to those plans, and a plan that was originally adopted pursuant to the broader statutory authority is amended in a way that makes it subject to the more limited statutory authority, the more limiting statute applies. That one statute may limit what would otherwise be permissible in that circumstance does not result in a statutory conflict. Commercial Real Estate Economic Coalition v. Metro, 37 Or LUBA 171 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A statute requiring that certain actions required under implementing ordinances adopted "pursuant to a regional framework plan" be delayed until the regional framework plan is acknowledged by LCDC does not apply where the implementing ordinance is not adopted pursuant to a regional framework plan. Commercial Real Estate Economic Coalition v. Metro, 37 Or LUBA 171 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Once Metro incorporates a functional plan into its regional framework plan, any subsequent amendments to the incorporated functional plan are subject to the limits imposed by ORS 268.390(5) on implementing ordinances adopted "[p]ursuant to a regional framework plan." Commercial Real Estate Economic Coalition v. Metro, 37 Or LUBA 171 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will reject a local government interpretation of a statute that would leave the universe of ordinances nominally regulated by the statute vacant. Such a construction fails to give effect to all subsections of the statute, contrary to ORS 174.010. Commercial Real Estate Economic Coalition v. Metro, 37 Or LUBA 171 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When a local zoning ordinance defines "Recreational Vehicle Camping Facilities" and explicitly permits such facilities in nine zones, but does not allow such facilities in a forest zone, such a facility is not properly allowed in the forest zones as a "campground." Cotter v. Clackamas County, 36 Or LUBA 172 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The rule of statutory construction favoring a particular provision over an inconsistent general provision is of limited help where the statutes governing street vacation decisions and land use decisions can both be viewed as defining particular kinds of city decisions. Root v. City of Medford, 35 Or LUBA 814 (1998).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When viewed in context, ORS 271.134(4) and ORS 53.20 do not unambiguously grant the circuit court jurisdiction to review all city street vacation decisions. The context for ORS 271.134(4) and ORS 53.20 includes other statutes concerning appellate review of city decisions, such as ORS 197.825(1) and ORS 197.015(10)(a), which govern appellate review of land use decisions. Root v. City of Medford, 35 Or LUBA 814 (1998).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The appropriate way to give effect to statutes governing judicial review of city street vacation decisions and LUBA review of city land use decisions is to require that city street vacation decisions that are also land use decisions be reviewed by LUBA as land use decisions while requiring that city street vacation decisions that are not land use decisions be reviewed by circuit court. Root v. City of Medford, 35 Or LUBA 814 (1998).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a city code provision grants a city authority to prescribe the "manner" of submitting the "application and related information" but the city has not adopted substantive requirements to implement that authority, the city may not interpret the code provision to deny an application simply because it was signed by the applicant rather than the record title holder. Doumani v. City of Eugene, 35 Or LUBA 388 (1999).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Legislative history makes it clear that "needed housing" is not to be subjected to standards, conditions or procedures that involve subjective, value-laden analyses designed to balance or mitigate impacts of the development on (1) the property to be developed or (2) the adjoining properties or community. Rogue Valley Assoc. of Realtors v. City of Ashland, 35 Or LUBA 139 (1998).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A code requirement that a street connection need not be required if certain circumstances exist does not obligate the local government to expressly find that such circumstances do not exist before requiring the street connection. Hannah v. City of Eugene, 35 Or LUBA 1 (1998) (1998).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a local provision sets forth criteria in the disjunctive, but the sense and context of the provision compel application of each criterion, LUBA will affirm as reasonable and correct an interpretation by the local planning commission that the criteria must be satisfied seriatim rather than alternatively. Recovery House VI v. City of Eugene, 34 Or LUBA 486 (1998).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The statutory definition of "public road" at ORS 368.001(5) is not applicable to approval of a forest template dwelling required by ORS 215.750(5) to be located on a tract that abuts a "road." Interpretation of a local code requirement that such dwellings be located on a "public road" is controlled by local legislative intent rather than by statute. Petersen v. Yamhill County, 33 Or LUBA 584 (1997).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA uses the same analytical framework to interpret an agency rule that it uses to interpret a statute, first examining the text and context of the rule to discern the intent of the rule makers, turning to contextual history only if that intent is unclear. DLCD v. Jackson County, 33 Or LUBA 302 (1997).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA cannot employ the rules of statutory construction to interpret plan and code provisions even when it does so only as a means to establish a baseline from which to determine whether a local government interpretation is "clearly wrong" or "beyond a colorable defense." Downtown Community Assoc. v. City of Portland, 33 Or LUBA 140 (1997).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Provisions of a zoning ordinance should be interpreted in a manner which gives meaning to all parts of the ordinance. Fechtig v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 410 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Under ORS 174.010, LUBA must give effect, if possible, to all provisions or particulars of a statute. Walz v. Polk County, 31 Or LUBA 363 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The inclusion of specific uses in an administrative rule tends to imply an intent to exclude related uses not mentioned. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Washington County, 31 Or LUBA 115 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. After Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), the general rules of statutory construction are not dispositive in LUBA review of local government interpretations of their own comprehensive plans and land use regulations. Nevertheless, the rules are helpful in supporting a determination that a local government's interpretation is not clearly wrong. Huntzicker v. Washington County, 30 Or LUBA 397 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Labels "substantive," "procedural" and "remedial," used in characterizing amendments to statutes, are not an adequate substitute for an analysis of how a new statute should apply to existing rights. Ramsay v. Linn County, 30 Or LUBA 283 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Absent some clear indication to the contrary, legislative acts are not to be applied retroactively. Ramsay v. Linn County, 30 Or LUBA 283 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When prospective application of a statute is required, the statute must be applied in a manner that does not affect legal rights and obligations arising out of past actions or occurrences. Ramsay v. Linn County, 30 Or LUBA 283 (1996).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where two separate ordinance provisions arguably establish two different deadlines for the filing of a local appeal, the more general ordinance provision is controlled by the more specific provision. Sparks v. City of Bandon, 30 Or LUBA 69 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. In the absence of some specific indication of a contrary intent, terms should be read consistently throughout a local government's plan and implementing development code. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. ORS 215.236(2) requires that farm assessment disqualifications be filed within 120 days of approval of a nonfarm dwelling permit only when the subject property is assessed for farm use at the time of approval. A county's decision to modify a condition of approval requiring disqualification from farm assessment within 120 days after approval does not violate ORS 215.236(2) when the subject property was not assessed for farm use at the time of approval. Wakeman v. Jackson County, 29 Or LUBA 521 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the city's zoning code allows private households in the commercial-service/professional zone so long as the private households meet the development standards of a multi-family zone, LUBA will affirm the city's interpretation that private households includes a multiplex dwelling. Stevens v. City of Medford, 29 Or LUBA 422 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the city's zoning code provides that some permitted uses are subject to special use restrictions, LUBA will affirm the city's interpretation that the existence of special use restrictions does not convert a permitted use into an unpermitted use. Stevens v. City of Medford, 29 Or LUBA 422 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. When the language of a state regulation is clear, neither LUBA nor a local government may alter its meaning through interpretation. Testa v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 383 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA may not, through interpretation, alter the express meaning of a state regulation, even when the regulation has unanticipated consequences when applied locally in conjunction with an acknowledged zoning ordinance. Testa v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 383 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. For ORS 197.829(4) to apply to LUBA's review of a governing body's interpretation of its own code, the connection between the local code provision and the statewide planning goal it is arguably designed to implement must be a close one. ORS 197.829(4) was not adopted to allow LUBA to reconsider the propriety of the original acknowledgment of comprehensive plans and land use regulations. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where an EFU zone includes two provisions allowing churches and schools, and one of those provisions includes the OAR 660-33-130(3) restriction against approving churches and schools within 3 miles of an urban growth boundary but the other provision does not, LUBA will not assume the county will apply the provision that lacks the 3-mile limitation as though it includes the 3-mile limitation. DLCD v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 242 (1994).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. If a county implements ORS 215.418(1) by providing in its code that it will notify DSL of "developments" in wetlands identified on the State-wide Wetlands Inventory, it must interpret "developments" consistently with the types of development applications and approvals for which such notice is required by ORS 215.418(1)(a) to (e). Redland/Viola/Fischer's Mill CPO v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 560 (1994).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Neither ORS 222.173 nor ORS 222.115 purports to preempt local government use of consents to annexation in circumstances other than those identified in ORS 222.173(1). Statements by individual legislators during legislative proceedings leading to adoption of ORS 222.115 expressing general hostility towards involuntary annexation do not establish a legislative intent to preclude city or county legislation concerning consents to annexation. Bear Creek Valley San. Auth. v. City of Medford, 27 Or LUBA 328 (1994).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. After Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), it is not clear whether general rules of statutory construction are relevant in LUBA review of local government interpretations of their own comprehensive plans and land use regulations. Even if they are, general rules of statutory construction are not absolute. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. That a proposed paintball game park could be allowed as a "private recreation use" in a commercial zone does not mean it cannot be allowed as a "park" in an EFU zone. Spiering v. Yamhill County, 25 Or LUBA 695 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A local government's interpretation of "park," as used in a provision of its zoning ordinance, need not be consistent with a definition of "park areas" in a separate ordinance establishing administrative regulations for the use of parks owned or controlled by the local government. Spiering v. Yamhill County, 25 Or LUBA 695 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. That a local government may have, in the past, erroneously interpreted its ordinances as not requiring a public hearing, does not require that the local government perpetuate that error. McInnis v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 376 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a "generally unsuitable" approval standard for nonforest dwellings established by an LCDC enforcement order provides that land with certain soil types is presumed not to be "generally unsuitable," unless findings explain why "other factors" make the land generally unsuitable, it is reasonable to interpret such "other factors" to be limited to the physical characteristics listed in the first part of the approval standard. DLCD v. Klamath County, 25 Or LUBA 355 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. All provisions of the act that created ORS 215.301 must be related to uses allowed in EFU zones. Therefore, ORS 215.301 applies only to asphalt plants sited in EFU zones, not to an application to site an asphalt plant in an industrial zone. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The rules applicable to the severability of statutes are also applicable to local enactments. Thus, an unconstitutional ordinance provision will be severed from the remainder unless it is apparent that the local legislative body would not have enacted the regulation without the disputed provision, or the remaining parts of the regulation would be incomplete and incapable of being executed in accordance with the legislative intent. Riverbend Landfill Company v. Yamhill County, 24 Or LUBA 466 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Local ordinances governing when a local decision becomes final are effective only to the extent they do not conflict with state statutes. A Storage Place v. City of Tualatin, 24 Or LUBA 637 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a code provision is capable of more than one rational interpretation, and the code provision was adopted to implement an LCDC administrative rule, consideration of the context and purpose of the administrative rule is relevant in determining the meaning of the code provision. Heceta Water District v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 402 (1993).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where there is no definition of the term "golf course" in the local code, the plain and ordinary meaning of that term as it is defined in the dictionary applies, and a driving range is not the equivalent of a golf course. DLCD v. Columbia County, 24 Or LUBA 338 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a local code identifies RV camping facilities as one type of service recreational facility, and certain zones specifically list RV camping facilities as a conditional use, whereas other zones list only service recreational facilities in general, the other zones simply allow a broader range of service recreational facilities, including RV camping facilities. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 296 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a term used in a local enactment is not defined in that or other local enactments, the term must be construed in accordance with its plain and ordinary meaning, absent some evidence of a contrary local legislative intent. Thatcher v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 207 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will refer to legislative history only where the terms of a disputed statute are ambiguous. Kishpaugh v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 164 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The existence of overlapping prohibitions in a local code does not provide a sufficient basis for creating an exception to one of the overlapping prohibitions that has no basis in the language of the code. Goose Hollow Foothills League v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 69 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. A county comprehensive plan map with a scale of 1 inch to 9 miles is ambiguous and, therefore, the county must interpret and apply its plan map to specific properties in the first instance. Larson v. Wallowa County, 23 Or LUBA 527 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where there is neither a local code nor a statutory definition of the term "perennial," the commonly understood meaning of that term is applied. Under the commonly understood meaning of "perennial," a Christmas tree is a perennial under ORS 215.213(2)(b)(A). Harwood v. Lane County, 23 Or LUBA 191 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the local code employs the terms "necessary for and accessory to," as a standard for farm dwellings in a mixed farm/forest zone, and where that standard appears to have been adopted to comply with Goal 4, it is appropriate to interpret the ordinance standard in a manner consistent with the interpretation of those terms in the context of Goal 4. Tipperman v. Union County, 22 Or LUBA 775 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a code separately lists "boarding of horses for profit" and "commercial activities in conjunction with farm use" as distinct conditional uses in certain exclusive farm use zones that another zone lists "commercial activities in conjunction with farm use" but does not list "boarding of horses for profit" as a conditional use, it is reasonable to infer that the latter use was not intended to be allowed in the other zone. Moody v. Deschutes County, 22 Or LUBA 567 (1992).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. In the absence of a local or other regulation making provisions of ORS chapter 468, pertaining to pollution control, applicable to an application for a wrecking certificate as independent approval standards, that statute does not govern local approval of a wrecking certificate. Bradbury v. City of Independence, 22 Or LUBA 398 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The correct way to resolve a conflict between code provisions that (1) specifically allow approval of golf courses in an EFU zone as a conditional use, but (2) establish approval standards for golf courses which make it impossible to ever approve a golf course in the exclusive farm use zone, is to conclude that the approval standards making approval an impossibility were not intended to govern approval of golf courses. Waker Associates, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 22 Or LUBA 233 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where there appear to be conflicting code provisions such that a code approval criterion has the effect of nullifying another code provision which specifically allows a use subject to that approval criterion, the local government should first consider whether the code standard is sufficiently ambiguous that it can be interpreted in a manner that avoids the conflict. If the code can be interpreted to avoid the conflict, that interpretation should be adopted. Waker Associates, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 22 Or LUBA 233 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where language used in a local ordinance corresponds to language used in a state statute or statewide planning goal, it is appropriate to interpret those ordinance provisions consistently with available authority for interpreting the relevant statute or goals. Tice v. Josephine County, 21 Or LUBA 371 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Absent some expression of legislative intent to the contrary, the legislature is presumed to have intended that the same term used in different sections of the exclusive farm use statute have the same meaning in both sections. Greuner v. Lane County, 21 Or LUBA 329 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the legislature intended to allow facilities for intensive training of dogs in the exclusive farm use zone, it specifically used the term "training" in addition to the term "kennel." ORS 215.213(1)(L). Greuner v. Lane County, 21 Or LUBA 329 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Because the statute allowing dog kennels in exclusive farm use zones do not define the term "dog kennel," that term must be given its plain and ordinary meaning, which includes boarding and breeding facilities but does not include training facilities. Greuner v. Lane County, 21 Or LUBA 329 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Provisions of a local zoning ordinance should be interpreted in a manner which gives meaning to all parts of the zoning ordinance. 19th Street Project v. City of the Dalles, 20 Or LUBA 440 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a zoning ordinance specifically lists a use as allowed in one zoning district and fails to specifically list that use in a second zoning district, but includes in the list of permitted uses in the second zoning district a more open ended category of uses, there is an "inference" that the use specifically allowed in the first zoning district is not also allowed in the second zoning district under the open ended use category. Sarti v. City of Lake Oswego, 20 Or LUBA 387 (1991).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA is required to determine whether a local government's interpretation of its code is correct and, in doing so, construes the provisions of the code as a whole, giving meaning to each part. Kittleson v. Lane County, 20 Or LUBA 286 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Because ORS 197.015(10)(b)(B) is a subsection of the statute which creates exceptions to LUBA's jurisdiction, LUBA will assume the legislature intended ORS 197.015(10)(b)(B) to be a workable exception, and will not interpret ORS 197.015(10)(b)(B) to require that LUBA conduct a substantive review of urban partition and subdivision decisions to determine whether LUBA has jurisdiction to conduct such a review in the first place. Southwood Homeowners Assoc. v. City of Philomath, 20 Or LUBA 279 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. In so far as possible, LUBA construes relevant local government comprehensive plan and code provisions together, to give meaning to both. Neuenschwander v. City of Ashland, 20 Or LUBA 144 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the language employed in the purpose statement of a code PUD chapter evidences only what the local government intends the consequences of application of the specific provisions of that PUD chapter to be, the purpose applications. White v. City of Oregon City, 20 Or LUBA 470 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a comprehensive plan provides that plan "goals, policies, strategies and standards" are "legally binding to land use decisions" when expressed in mandatory language, relevant plan agricultural goals, policies, strategies and standards which are expressed in mandatory language are applicable to a request for conditional use approval for a golf course in the county's exclusive farm use zone. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 19 Or LUBA 404 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. After-the-fact statements by county commissioners and the planning director concerning the intended applicability of plan provisions are not competent legislative history. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 19 Or LUBA 404 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a code provision is specifically amended to provide that the amended code provision does not apply to "minor land divisions," LUBA will not apply that code provision to "minor land divisions" even though such divisions may also satisfy the unamended definitions of subdivision or partition, to which the amended code provision continues to apply. Nicolai v. City of Portland, 19 Or LUBA 142 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Absent a clear expression of intent to the contrary, when a local government adopts a requirement in terms substantially identical to a statutory or Statewide Planning Goal provision, the local code provision must be interpreted as the mimicked statute or goal is interpreted. O'Brien v. City of West Linn, 18 Or LUBA 665 (1990).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where an alleged ambiguity in an ordinance definition is not apparent, and the parties do not demonstrate the existence of an ambiguity, LUBA will conclude the ordinance definition is not ambiguous. Wagner v. City of Yachats, 17 Or LUBA 1322 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the local code draws a distinction between private schools in general and narrowly defines "commercial schools," the term "commercial schools" does not apply to schools offering the broader range of courses typically offered at a community college. Highway 213 Coalition v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 1284 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where the local code allows public and private schools as a conditional use, and the code envisions both private schools that are similar to public schools and private schools that are not similar to public schools, the term "schools" is not limited to those with strictly traditional curricula. Highway 213 Coalition v. Clackamas County, 17 Or LUBA 1284 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The rules that govern statutory construction also apply to the construction of local government ordinances. Mental Health Division v. Lake County, 17 Or LUBA 1165 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where a county code lists "other uses as authorized by ORS 215.213" as conditional uses in an EFU zone, but does not express an intent to adopt future amendments to ORS 215.213, LUBA will interpret the code to authorize as conditional uses only those uses listed in ORS 215.213 on the date that provision of the county code was adopted. Mental Health Division v. Lake County, 17 Or LUBA 1165 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. LUBA will interpret ordinance provisions together to give meaning to each part, and will not construe and ordinance provision in a manner which would render another provision meaningless. League of Women Voters v. Metro Service Dist., 17 Or LUBA 949 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. The use of the words "may" and "shall" in ORS chapter 215 indicate that the legislature did not intend to require that counties adopting EFU zones incorporate ORS 215.213(1) and (2) verbatim. Kola Tepee, Inc. v. Marion County, 17 Or LUBA 910 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Statements made

20 years after a statute was enacted are of no value in determining the original legislative intent. Kola Tepee, Inc. v. Marion County, 17 Or LUBA 910 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Provisions of local government codes should be interpreted together, in a manner which gives meaning to all parts. Kenton Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Portland, 17 Or LUBA 784 (1989).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Post adoption interpretation of a code provision is not competent legislative history of the original intent in adopting the code provision. Hay v. City of Cannon Beach, 17 Or LUBA 322 (1988).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Rules of statutory construction apply to construction of municipal ordinances. Hay v. City of Cannon Beach, 17 Or LUBA 322 (1988).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where code language is not ambiguous, it is necessary to resort to legislative history to determine legislative intent. Hay v. City of Cannon Beach, 17 Or LUBA 322 (1988).

1.1.2 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Rules of Construction. Where two county ordinance provisions control conditional uses and neither indicates that it is not applicable in a particular zone or is the only provision applicable to conditional uses in a particular zone, LUBA will conclude that both conditional use approval sections are applicable in that zone. Rodgers v. Douglas County, 17 Or LUBA 122 (1988).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA reviews interpretations of conditions of approval to determine whether they are correct. Matthews v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 757 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision allows "public utility facilities, including substations and transmission lines," in a particular zone, the governing body does not err by concluding that a utility facility is "public" so long as it is necessary for the public health, safety, and welfare, even if it is not publicly owned; that a utility facility benefits the public health, safety, and welfare by increasing the overall capacity and redundancy within the larger utility system; and that a utility facility is "public" even if it benefits the public generally and not just residents of the local community. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Tillamook County, 81 Or LUBA 633 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provides that a use not listed in a particular zone may be permitted in that zone if it is "of the same general character, or has similar impacts on nearby properties, as do other uses permitted in the zone," the governing body does not err by concluding that a particular use satisfies that criterion even if it has lesser negative impacts than permitted uses. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Tillamook County, 81 Or LUBA 633 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government need not interpret the term "protect" the same way in the context of a statewide planning goal that does not protect a specific, unique natural resource or specific recreation area that it does in the context of a goal that does protect those things, even where the definitions of "protect" in the latter goal and in the local government's comprehensive plan are identical. Crowley v. City of Hood River, 81 Or LUBA 490 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan provision allows "minor navigational improvements" in a particular zone, which it defines as "alterations necessary to provide water access to existing or permitted uses in conservation management units," an interpretation of that provision as not requiring that the use for which the alteration is needed and the alteration itself be located in the same zone is consistent with the provision's express language; however, an interpretation of that provision as allowing alterations that are needed for a use that is not located in a "conservation management unit" is inconsistent the provision's express language. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan management objective allows "a limited boat dock for transient recreation craft tie-up" in a particular zone, and the uses and activities matrix for the zone allows "docks" without limitation, but a different comprehensive plan provision states that uses and activities matrices are "subordinate" to management objectives and that allowed uses and activities must be "consistent" with the management objectives, a local government errs by allowing nonlimited boat docks in the zone. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision requires that a "declaration of anticipated noise levels" be attached to certain land use approvals and that applicants incorporate noise abatement strategies where noise levels are anticipated to exceed a certain threshold, the word "declaration" anticipates more than a statement from the applicant's attorney, without supporting documents or studies, and a reasonable person would not rely on such statements alone to conclude that the noise threshold is not exceeded. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where comprehensive plan provisions provide, using mandatory language, that certain resource plan and zoning designations shall be used to conserve or protect fish and wildlife habitat from conflicting uses and that land use proposals that have undesirable impacts on those resources shall be reviewed during the plan and zone amendment processes, a local governing body errs in interpreting those provisions to conclude that it may apply nonresource plan and zoning designations to property mapped as fish and wildlife habitat and that any impacts may be evaluated and, if necessary, mitigated during subsequent review of development proposals. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Linn County, 81 Or LUBA 338 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county code provision provides that a nonconforming use may not be resumed if there is a "discontinuance" for a period greater than one year, the county board of commissioners does not err in interpreting the undefined term "discontinuance" by resorting to the dictionary definition and in applying that interpretation to conclude that a property owner who is actively pursuing permits to complete repairs and upgrades that are required for health and safety reasons, and who is actively responding to appeals of those permits, has not discontinued a nonconforming use. Such an interpretation and application of the term "discontinuance" in the county code provision is not contrary to the term "interruption" in ORS 215.130(7)(a). Campbell v. Columbia County, 81 Or LUBA 385 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where one local code provision requires that "the characteristics of the site [be] suitable for the proposed use considering size, shape, location, topography and natural features"; and where another local code provision requires that development plans "be reviewed to assess the possible presence of any geologic hazard" and provides that, if a geologic hazard is suspected, the developer must submit a report "which satisfactorily evaluates the degree of hazard present and recommends appropriate precautions to avoid endangering life and property and minimize erosion," and provides that "[t]he burden of proof is on the landowner to show that it is safe to build"; LUBA will defer to the governing body's interpretation that an applicant's geologic report related to the "safe to build" criterion, rather than the "suitability" criterion. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Bandon, 81 Or LUBA 285 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision requires that uses be conducted "wholly within an enclosed structure"; where the local code defines "structure" as both "[a]nything which is constructed, erected or built and located on or under the ground, or attached to something fixed to the ground," and "[a] walled and roofed building including a gas or liquid storage tank that is principally above ground"; where the first definition was in effect when the enclosed structure requirement was first enacted; and where the second definition was enacted as part of an ordinance that related to compliance with FEMA's requirements to participate in the National Flood Insurance Program, LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of the enclosed structure requirement, relying on the first definition of "structure," to allow a use that is surrounded by building walls, retaining walls, and fences. Beaverton Business Owners, LLC v. City of Beaverton, 81 Or LUBA 224 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local design guideline provides that "[p]rimary building entrances should be oriented toward and located in close proximity to public streets and public street intersections" and that "[p]roperty size, shape and topographical conditions should also be considered," LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of that guideline to allow the primary entrance to a proposed development to be located on the opposite side of the property and oriented away from public streets where the primary entrance would nevertheless be "in close proximity to" those public streets and connected to those public streets with multiple pedestrian connections, and where the triangular shape of the property and a partially adjacent high-speed on-ramp to a highway support the applicant's choice to cluster the proposed development toward the public streets and provide a primary entrance on the opposite side of the property. Beaverton Business Owners, LLC v. City of Beaverton, 81 Or LUBA 224 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where comprehensive plan and local code provisions provide that the comprehensive plan may be amended only when "[t]here is a demonstrated public need for the change," and where another comprehensive plan provision states that the desired land use pattern in the urban growth boundary includes "[n]eighborhoods with a mix of uses, diversity of housing types, pedestrian scale, a defined center and shared public areas," the governing body does not err in concluding that that there is a "public need" to redesignate the subject property to High Density Residential (HDR) because the property is in a neighborhood of low- and medium-density housing and because introducing HDR zoning into the area will allow higher-density housing in a new location within the jurisdiction and potentially increase housing supply and diversity, even where the jurisdiction's acknowledged Buildable Lands Inventory and other, more recent data indicate that there is no deficit of HDR land in the jurisdiction. Carson Property LUBA Appeal, Inc. v. City of Corvallis, 81 Or LUBA 175 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city code provision provides that "[t]he footprint of any other new structure or any horizontal addition requiring at least one footing in ocean bluff areas must be set back from the bluff" a certain distance; where the documents identified by the provision as the resources the city is to consult in order to identify the location of the bluff edge are documents reflecting historic conditions; where grading is not listed as exempt from the requirements of the chapter; where the code does not support the conclusion that the city may, in evaluating the required setback, sever the construction of a structure from the associated grading proposed as site preparation; where the material that the code requires be included in a geological hazard report supports the interpretation that the bluff edge is to be determined based upon existing conditions; and where the code allows variances to be considered to reduce the building setback if the variance helps lessen the risk of erosion or other hazard, an interpretation of the provision as providing that permitted development, such as grading and excavation, can occur prior to establishing the location of the bluff edge is inconsistent with the provision's express language and context for purposes of ORS 197.829(1). Kimbrell v. City of Lincoln City, 81 Or LUBA 10 (2020).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. To the extent that LUBA's holding in Perry v. Yamhill County, 26 Or LUBA 73, 80, aff'd, 125 Or App 588, 865 P2d 1344 (1993), that the reasoning in Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), extends to a local government's interpretation of a prior land use decision, was correct, it was superseded by ORS 197.829(1), which requires LUBA to affirm "a local government's interpretation of its comprehensive plan and land use regulations" but does not require LUBA to affirm a local government's interpretation of a prior land use decision, findings adopted in support thereof, or conditions of approval attached thereto, which LUBA reviews under ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D) to determine whether the local government "[i]mproperly construed the applicable law." M & T Partners, Inc. v. City of Salem, 80 Or LUBA 221 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a design guideline for a historic district in a city requires that exterior alterations and additions to historic resources "be designed to be compatible primarily with the original resource, secondarily with adjacent properties, and finally * * * with the rest of the District," where the city council interprets the term "compatible" as not requiring uniformity, and where the petitioner has not demonstrated that that interpretation is inconsistent with the express language, purpose, or underlying policy that provides the basis for that design guideline, LUBA will uphold the city council's conclusion that two proposed new buildings meet the design guideline because they are similar to a historic resource on the same property, to adjacent properties, and to the historic district with respect to some design elements, even where they are dissimilar to adjacent properties with respect to other design elements. NDNA v. City of Portland, 80 Or LUBA 269 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county code provision allows "[p]arks, playgrounds, [and] community centers" in the Rural Residential (RR) zone, where the county code does not include a definition of "park," and where the board of county commissioners county relies upon the dictionary definition of "park" and the types of park uses recognized nationally and found in a nearby city park and in other county parks to conclude that the provision allows (1) year-round use of a portion of RR-zoned property for day camps, retreats, and environmental education programming for a maximum of 100 persons and a weeklong overnight camp serving youth, and (2) the use of another portion of the property "for small social gatherings of its members and guests of up to 500 persons in size for picnics, weddings, and memorials during the months of April through October weather permitting," LUBA will affirm the board of county commissioners' interpretation of the provision, even if a different interpretation might be better. Klein v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 287 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county code provision allows "campgrounds" in the Rural Residential (RR) zone but not "youth camps," and where the board of county commissioners relies on the definition of "youth camp" elsewhere in the code to conclude that a "youth camp" must be a permanent use, LUBA will affirm the board of county commissioners' interpretation of the provision to allow a weeklong youth overnight camp in the RR zone where the petitioners do not identify any provision of any statute or administrative rule with which the county's interpretation is inconsistent or establish that the county's interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the county code or the underlying purpose of the RR zone. Klein v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 287 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the circumstances under which a local code provision applies are not clearly articulated in that provision or specified in any other local code provision, LUBA cannot say that an argument that the governing body misinterpreted that provision is one that "no reasonable lawyer would conclude * * * possessed legal merit" for purposes of awarding attorney fees under ORS 197.830(15)(b), even where the governing body's interpretation was required to be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1). Vannatta v. City of St. Helens, 80 Or LUBA 1018 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A petitioner is not required to anticipate erroneous findings or interpretations in a final decision in order to challenge them at LUBA. Where petitioner raised an issue before the city council regarding fees and argued that the local appeal was invalid because of an allegedly invalid fee waiver decision, petitioner could not have anticipated the city's decision along with its attendant findings and interpretations, until the city issued its final decision. Accordingly, petitioner did not have the opportunity to raise specific challenges to the city's decision regarding the fee waiver during the local proceeding and therefore may raise them for the first time on appeal to LUBA. Riverview Abbey Mausoleum Company v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 38 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city's interpretation of its former version of a city code requirement that required that an appeal request include either the appeal fee or a fee waiver that had been approved by the planning director prior to the appeal deadline, and LUBA affirmed the city's interpretation, but the city code has since been amended and the city's code no longer requires a fee waiver be approved prior to the appeal deadline, and instead allows a local appellant to submit a fee waiver request and appeal request together, the city is not bound by its prior code, nor its interpretation of its prior code, and prior LUBA case law applying prior city code is no longer controlling. Riverview Abbey Mausoleum Company v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 38 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Whether emergency access to the subject property is within the scope of an easement requires interpretation of the easement and is a matter of real estate law involving, among other things, a determination of the intent of the parties to the easement. Land use review bodies such as the city council are not particularly competent bodies to render interpretations of ambiguous terms in easements or deeds. Generally, a final and authoritative determination regarding the intent and scope of deeds, easements and similar real estate documents can be obtained only in circuit court, based on application of real estate law. McNichols v. City of Canby, 79 Or LUBA 139 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where an issue arises regarding compliance with an approval criterion that can be resolved only by interpretation of the ambiguous terms of an easement, the most problematic option for a local land use review body is to rely, without more, on its own interpretation of the ambiguous terms of an easement to determine compliance with the approval criterion. A less problematic option would be to impose conditions, at least as an alternative, intended to ensure that the legal uncertainty is resolved prior to final development approvals. The least problematic option is for the local government to interpret the terms of its approval criterion, if it can, to the effect that compliance can be determined regardless of how the ambiguous terms of the easement are interpreted or whether the dispute over the terms of the easement is resolved. McNichols v. City of Canby, 79 Or LUBA 139 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city's minimum lot size requirements are based, in part, upon a code provision which requires a measurement of a lot's "slope," and the city interprets the term "slope" to be determined using post-development grades, rather than pre-development grades, LUBA will uphold the city's interpretation as "plausible" subject to Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), where the city found that "slope" is an ambiguous term, and the city interprets the term in a manner consistent with its interpretation of the text and in context of historical application of the code provision. An ambiguous code provision term is one with more than one possible construction of the term, and the local government interprets such a term in a "plausible" manner when read consistently with the express language of the code, as read in context. Estroff v. City of Dundee, 79 Or LUBA 189 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a code provision states that the "provisions of this code shall be interpreted as minimum requirements. When this code imposes a greater restriction than is required by other provisions of law * * * the provisions of this code shall control," and petitioners argue that the city erred in applying the least restrictive, rather than the most restrictive interpretation of the city's code requirement that minimum lot size be determined by "slope," by allowing project applicants to measure slope after grading, rather than before grading, to maximize their potential minimum developable lot size, but petitioners do not identify what other provision of law imposes a lesser restriction as regards to minimum lot size that the city should have applied, petitioners have not provided a basis for reversal or remand. Estroff v. City of Dundee, 79 Or LUBA 189 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Even if a local government's interpretation of its code were less plausible than petitioners' preferred interpretation, the "existence of a stronger or more logical interpretation does not render a weaker or less logical interpretation 'implausible' under the Siporen[v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010),] standard." Mark Latham Excavation, Inc. v. Deschutes County, 250 Or App 543, 555, 281 P3d 644 (2012). Estroff v. City of Dundee, 79 Or LUBA 189 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city code defines "net density" to mean "the number of dwelling units per acre of land in actual residential use and reserved for the exclusive use of the residents in the development," and excludes public and private streets, the city did not err in including in the net density acreage calculation parking drives designed primarily to provide vehicular circulation to parking spaces in the apartment complex for resident and visitor parking and a leasing office and maintenance building. Hulme v. City of Eugene, 79 Or LUBA 218 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a cross-petitioner seeks a remedy not available to it by statute, it is an obstacle to LUBA's review of the cross-assignment of error. LUBA lacks authority to affirm in part, and reverse in part a local government's approval of cross-petitioner's project application. ORS 197.835(1). Even assuming that the city erred by applying Willamette Greenway standards to cross-petitioner's housing project application, because they are not "clear and objective," the city's decision approving the development could not be reversed because it is not "prohibited as a matter of law." If LUBA agreed with cross-petitioners, the correct disposition would be remand, except that remand was not requested and would have no effect on the city's decision approving the application. In such a situation, LUBA will consider the request a contingent cross-assignment of error. Hulme v. City of Eugene, 79 Or LUBA 218 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Goal 15 guidelines and county code requirements that require to "the greatest possible degree, necessary and adequate public access will be provided along the Willamette River by appropriate legal means," can be met where the city finds that current public access along the river provided by a public riverfront path is adequate, and the city does not err in construing the provision as requiring access only "along" the river instead of "to" the river. Hulme v. City of Eugene, 79 Or LUBA 218 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision prohibits the local government from approving an application for development if the property is "in violation of applicable land use regulations," a local governing body's interpretation that a decision that (1) determines only that existing development requires land use approvals, or (2) denies an application to approve existing development does not constitute a determination of a "violation" is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose, or policy of the code provision and is therefore entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1)(a) to (c). Bishop v. Deschutes County, 79 Or LUBA 380 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision prohibits a "[p]layground, recreation facility or community center owned and operated by a government agency or nonprofit community organization," a local governing body does not misconstrue the provision by interpreting the phrase "owned and operated by a government agency or nonprofit community organization" as applying to each antecedent rather than just to the last antecedent, community centers, and therefore as permitting a private recreation facility in the zone, where (1) the provision's language implements state law, which is concerned only with public facilities, (2) the code sets out a separate use category for "recreation-oriented facility," and (3) the local government has historically viewed the provision to encompass only public facilities. Bishop v. Deschutes County, 79 Or LUBA 380 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county approves an amendment to a planned development approval for a resort, golf course and aerial challenge course, and petitioner argues the county improperly construed the applicable provisions of the county's code, but petitioner has not ultimately challenged the board of county commissioners' interpretation, or otherwise explained why LUBA is not required to affirm that interpretation under ORS 197.829(1), petitioner has provided no basis for reversal or remand. Carkulis v. Lincoln County, 79 Or LUBA 610 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioner argues the county committed a procedural error that prejudiced his substantial rights when the board of county commissioners failed to consider a written statement that petitioner submitted to the board of commissioners at the hearing, but petitioner does not establish that the board of county commissioners actually failed to consider petitioner's written statement, and petitioner failed to object to the alleged procedural error below, petitioner has not established that the county committed a procedural error or violated an applicable legal standard. Carkulis v. Lincoln County, 79 Or LUBA 610 (2019).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county approved a proposed variance to the 20-acre minimum lot size for two one-acre parcels, pursuant to a county code provision that provides that the county planning director may approve a variance for a proposed project if the city does not object to the variance, LUBA will reverse the county's decision as "prohibited as a matter of law" pursuant to OAR 661-010-0071(c) where the county approved the variance as "consistent with the * * * city's comprehensive plan," but the city objected to the proposed variance because of the proposal's inconsistency with the city's comprehensive plan. City of Albany v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 1 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reject a county's interpretation of its code—that a code provision which sets forth approval criteria regarding an application for a variance to the minimum lot size requirements within the county's urban growth area may not apply to the county's decision because it only applies to decisions made by the county's planning director but not to decisions made by the planning commission or board of county commissioners—that was made for the first time in its response brief, because that interpretation is not reflected in the decision and is therefore not an interpretation by the local government. City of Albany v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 1 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer does not misconstrue a development code requirement that a project applicant must demonstrate that environmental impacts have been "minimized to the extent practicable," in finding that the project applicant is not required to propose a smaller sized dwelling. McAndrew v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 21 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When the county is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1), the decision can be reversed only if the interpretation is inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy underlying the relevant code language. Under a non-deferential standard of review petitioner must demonstrate that the commissioners' interpretation is reversible. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 78 Or LUBA 81 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Petitioners did not demonstrate that the county hearings officer erred where local county standards apply to development in "areas designated as floodways [as found on Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) maps] or by methods described" elsewhere in the code, and the county hearings officer determined that because the development was not located within the "floodway," those standards did not apply. This is so, even where petitioners argue the FEMA maps are inaccurate and another section of code authorizes the county floodplain administrator to determine where the floodway is currently located based on "actual field conditions," but the county administrator has chosen not to exercise the authority granted in that section. Meyer v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 150 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county hearings officer agreed that the proposed project involved "the alteration of a watercourse" and that therefore standards applied which required the project applicant to show that the development "will not diminish the carrying capacity of a watercourse" by submitting "certification by an Oregon registered professional engineer," that in the engineer's opinion the watercourse "will not be diminished," the applicant has met those requirements by submitting the certification by a licensed engineer, even though another section of the county's code requires the applicant to "submit technical data" and a "Conditional Letter of Map Revision" from FEMA "when an alteration of a watercourse results in the expansion, relocation or elimination of the special flood hazard area [SFHA]" because the engineer certified that the project has not resulted in the expansion, relocation or elimination of the SFHA. Meyer v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 150 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When comprehensive plan policies are not mandatory approval standards for a land use application, but the application must be evaluated for consistency with applicable plan policies, the evaluation may require some weighing and balancing of competing policy directions embodied in the applicable plan provisions. The local government's evaluation, weighing and balancing of competing interests as well as ambiguous comprehensive plan provisions are entitled to a deferential standard of review under ORS 197.829(1)(a)–(c) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Yamhill Creek Solar, LLC v. Yamhill County, 78 Or LUBA 245 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although the county concedes it erred in denying a plan amendment and zone change application based on the belief that the subject property was, at the time the county made its decision, within a designated urban reserve area, when the LCDC's urban reserve designation regarding the subject property had not actually become final at the time in question, LUBA will not remand the decision if the county's decision identifies at least one valid basis for denial that is affirmed on appeal. Stafford Investments, LP v. Clackamas County, 78 Or LUBA 320 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county's comprehensive plan policy provides that "areas" may be designated rural commercial when the areas (1) have a "historical commitment" to commercial uses, or (2) the "areas" are "located within an Unincorporated Community" and have "direct access to a road of at least collector classification," petitioner has not demonstrated that the county commissioners' findings regarding the meaning of "area" are inadequate or that the county's reliance on a previous interpretation as authority for interpreting the term "areas" as used in rezoning criteria to refer only to the property being considered for rezoning, and not also to include the surrounding area, was in error where petitioner cites to no contextual differences suggesting that the term "areas" should be interpreted differently than the same term used in similar rezoning standards, or authority suggesting the county has an obligation to adopt specific findings regarding the parties' alternative interpretations. Stafford Investments, LP v. Clackamas County, 78 Or LUBA 320 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will uphold a county's interpretation of its own comprehensive plan policy regarding when a property may be designated rural commercial where the county evaluated the historic uses of the subject property and concluded that those uses did not demonstrate a "historical commitment to commercial uses," after concluding that (1) temporary commercial uses, (2) incidental or accessory commercial uses to permitted residential or farm uses on the property, and (3) the current unlawful commercial uses on the property were not sufficient to demonstrate "historical commitment" of the property to commercial use, where the county chose to focus on "commitment" which the county understood to require an inquiry into the nature of the historic uses on the property and a determination of whether commercial uses have constrained the scope of the uses on the property such that going forward only commercial uses are feasible, rather than defining commitment in terms of years of commercial use. Stafford Investments, LP v. Clackamas County, 78 Or LUBA 320 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioner argues that the city erred by failing to apply a national historic trail master plan and national historic trail district guidelines to applicant's proposed project, presenting evidence that the city "effectively" adopted the master plan by "endorsing" it during planning commission meetings over the years, the city's "endorsement" does not amount to "adoption" of the plan and guidelines, nor does "incorporation by reference" transform an "ancillary" document into mandatory approval criteria. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 78 Or LUBA 463 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's code interpretation of a county zoning ordinance that provides that a permit extension may be granted if the "approval criteria for the original decision found in a state goal, policy, statute or administrative rule, the Comprehensive Plan or this Ordinance have not changed," and the county board of commissioners interprets "have not changed" to mean an administrative or legislative amendment to the administratively enacted or codified law described in the same provision, and not include decisional law not that is not administratively enacted or codified, as long as such interpretation is "plausible." Hood River Valley Residents Comm. v. Hood River County, 78 Or LUBA 478 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a LUBA decision merely "ascertain[ed] and declare[d]" what the laws at issue provided from the time of their enactment pursuant to ORS 174.010, such interpretative exercise cannot constitute a "change in the law." Hood River Valley Residents Comm. v. Hood River County, 78 Or LUBA 478 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer's interpretation is inadequate for review before LUBA where the hearings officer finds that that a proposed bed and breakfast inn designed for occupancy by an employee caretaker and up to eight non-resident guests qualifies as a "bed and breakfast inn," without explaining how a caretaker occupancy is consistent with the county code which defines a bed and breakfast inn as an "owner-occupied" "single-family dwelling unit." Elenes v. Deschutes County, 78 Or LUBA 483 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The city's comprehensive plan housing goal, Goal 10, and its policies and implementing measures, provide further contextual support for the city's interpretation of its code regarding a prohibition on lot size adjustment "[t]o allow an increase in density in the [low density residential] RL zone" by using as the denominator the gross acreage of a subdivision as a whole, rather than the acreage of individual properties. One of the Goal 10 housing goals is to "[p]romote the efficient use of vacant land by encouraging infill development which is sensitive to existing neighborhoods, and by encouraging new development which achieves the density allowed by the comprehensive plan." The city's interpretation is consistent with Goal 10 and the policies and implementing measures because it interprets "density" and "acre" to allow new infill development of vacant land to achieve a density that is allowed by the comprehensive plan. Hunt v. City of the Dalles, 78 Or LUBA 509 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioner argues the city governing body's finding regarding the applicability of a zoning ordinance was erroneous, and the city concedes the finding is erroneous, but when the error is not critical to the city council's interpretation or ultimate conclusions, the error does not provide a basis for reversal or remand. Hunt v. City of the Dalles, 78 Or LUBA 509 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council's interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy requiring that city parks be protected against incompatible uses, to mean that city parks will be protected against approval of incompatible uses on adjoining lands, not that the city is also precluded from rezoning city parks to allow non-park uses of park lands, where the city council's narrower interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose and policy underlying the plan policy. Crowley v. City of Hood River, 77 Or LUBA 117 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That county staff have in the past approved recreational vehicles as permanent residential dwellings does not provide a basis to interpret the county code to allow recreational vehicles to be used as permanent residential dwellings, where the county code definition of "recreational vehicle" prohibits their use as permanent residential dwellings. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Tillamook County, 77 Or LUBA 192 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The question under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 259, 243 P3d 776 (2010), is not whether petitioner's interpretation that a "street alignment and connections standard" and a "street connectivity standard" can be met by street extensions that terminate in a cul-de-sac is plausible. The question under Siporen is whether the city council's contrary interpretation that the standards require street extensions that connect with other streets on both ends is plausible, and the city council's interpretation is certainly plausible. Martin v. City of Tigard, 77 Or LUBA 288 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A decision that adopts a different position regarding how a street connectivity standard applies in a decision following a LUBA remand from the position adopted in the initial decision is not inconsistent with the holding in Holland v. Cannon Beach, 154 Or App 450, 962 P2d 701, rev den, 328 Or 115 (1998). In Holland, the Court of Appeals held a city erred by concluding in its initial decision that a slope and density standard had been repealed and therefore did not apply to a land division, and when its decision to deny the land division was remanded by LUBA, took the opposite position and applied the slope and density standard to deny the land division following remand. The change of position in Holland was a change of position in whether the standard applied, which is different from a change of position in how a standard applied. Martin v. City of Tigard, 77 Or LUBA 288 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city commission's interpretation of its code to permit the city to exercise its property rights under ORS 197.772(1) to refuse to consent to historic landmark designation separately from the city's grant of authority to the historic review board to consider and approve applications for historic landmark designations is plausible, and therefore must be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 261, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Therefore, the historic review board must terminate consideration of a neighborhood association's application to designate city-owned property as a historic landmark when the city manager refuses to consent to the proposed historic landmark designation. McLoughlin Neighborhood Association v. City of Oregon City, 77 Or LUBA 377 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city commission's interpretation of a city manager's general authority to exercise "supervision over all city property" to be broad enough to include authority for the city manager to refuse to consent to a proposed historic landmark designation for city-owned property is not reversible under ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D) ("[i]mproperly construed the applicable law"). McLoughlin Neighborhood Association v. City of Oregon City, 77 Or LUBA 377 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The ORS 197.772(2) right to refuse to consent to historic designation of property, which is given to "property owners," is not limited to owners of private property. A city may refuse to consent to historic designation of city-owned property, where a neighborhood organization files an application to designate that city-owned property as an historic landmark. McLoughlin Neighborhood Association v. City of Oregon City, 77 Or LUBA 377 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local governing body commits no error in requesting that a prevailing party prepare written findings for it to adopt. And the governing body commits no error in adopting written findings that deviate from statements made at the final evidentiary hearing, and it is those written findings and not the oral statements that are subject to LUBA review on the merits. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Findings of fact and law are the decision; they are not evidence. A local governing body commits no error in adopting new findings following a LUBA remand for inadequate findings, without reopening the evidentiary record. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government does not misinterpret the term "substation" by interpreting it to be an example of the use category "utilities" that is broad enough to include a wireless transmission tower. And it does not matter that the wireless transmission tower is a cell tower and that there were no cell towers in 1984 when the legislation defining substation and utilities was adopted. There were radio transmission and communication towers in 1984, which are similar to cell towers, and it is not unusual for new uses to come into existence and fall into existing broad use categories. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local governing body's conclusion—that the general category of utility "[d]istribution plants and substations" adopted in 1984 is broad enough to include a wireless transmission tower—is not inconsistent with contemporary and other dictionary definitions of "distribution," "plant" and "substation." Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local governing body does not err by refusing to view the term "distribution plants and substations" as a technical term or term of art. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. When a local government adopts a new rule of interpretation it is not limited to applying that new rule of interpretation to subsequently enacted legislation. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioners take the position that historic review and site plan review approval standards are so incompatible that site plan review entirely displaces historic review, but the city council's interpretation of its code that both reviews are possible and that historic review may be completed before site plan review is plausible, LUBA must defer to the city council's interpretation. Friends of Canemah v. City of Oregon City, 77 Or LUBA 434 (2018).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of the code term "processing" (converting a natural mineral into a useful product) to include a facility that transforms natural gas into a liquefied form to more conveniently transport the gas to overseas markets aboard tanker ships, notwithstanding that after the liquefied natural gas reaches its destination it is returned to gaseous form, because in its intermediate liquid state the gas is a "useful product." Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 76 Or LUBA 346 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A finding that the mixed-use development that might be developed under a new plan map designation will be "near" a transit corridor is sufficient to demonstrate compliance with a plan policy to focus mixed-use development "along" transit corridors, where the city's plan and land use regulations do not define either term and the term "along" is sufficiently subjective that the city's implicit interpretation and application of the policy is not implausible under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 249, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 75 Or LUBA 38 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where both the hearings officer and planning commission declined to address an argument regarding the standards and criteria that might apply to a hypothetical future building permit application for approved housing, and where petitioner points to nothing in the local government's code that requires the hearings officer or planning commission to address petitioner's argument, LUBA will decline to issue what is in essence an advisory opinion regarding that argument. Wiper v. City of Eugene, 75 Or LUBA 109 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A County Court's interpretation of a comprehensive plan residential density standard that limits residential density in deer winter range to one dwelling unit per 160 acres to only consider nonfarm dwellings when computing density is not affirmable under ORS 197.829(1)(a) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 261, 243 P3d 776 (2010), where there is no textual support in the wildlife density standard itself for only counting nonfarm dwellings in computing density and the comprehensive plan policies the density limit was adopted to implement also do not support distinguishing between farm and nonfarm dwellings in computing density. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Crook County, 75 Or LUBA 186 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Deference under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), and ORS 197.829(1) is only appropriate for interpretations that are adopted by the local governing body. Those interpretations include interpretations that are adopted initially by other bodies, so long as the local governing body adopts those interpretations of other bodies. Rawson v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 200 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local governing body adopts a planning commission decision on appeal, interpretations adopted directly by the planning commission or adopted by incorporation by the planning commission are entitled to deference under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), and ORS 197.829(1). Rawson v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 200 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance lists general use categories for a particular zoning district, followed by a listing of particular uses under those general use categories, a local governing body's interpretation that adopts a broad dictionary definition of the use category "Utilities" and finds that a cell tower is a permitted use under that definition, when cell towers are not one of the two particular uses listed under the general category of Utilities, is not an interpretation that must be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1) and is not entitled to deference under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Rawson v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 200 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance separation standard applies to "buildings," defined in the zoning ordinance as "[a] structure built for support, shelter, or enclosure of persons, animals, chattels, or property of any kind," a local government is within its interpretive discretion to interpret the separation standard not to apply to cell towers. Although cell towers are "structures," they are not "built for support, shelter, or enclosure of persons, animals, chattels, or property of any kind." Rawson v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 200 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An interpretation of local law that is offered in a brief at LUBA, but was not adopted by the local government, is not entitled to deference under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), and ORS 197.829(1). Rawson v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 200 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of its lot of record provisions, to the effect that consolidation of discrete parcels can be accomplished only by means of a county process resulting in county land use approval, and not by simply recording a deed, where that interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy underlying the lot of record provision. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 328 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of the phrase "designated common area" as used in a plan policy governing a resort community zone to mean something different than a definition of "common area" in an unrelated section of the comprehensive plan that cross-references the definition of "common property" as used in the Oregon Planned Communities Act at ORS 94.550(7), where the latter definition was adopted at a different time and to serve a different purpose than the plan policy governing the resort community zone. Kine v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 407 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy concerning sites "developed as a golf course" to apply to sites adjoining a fairway that were landscaped and used as a playable area in 2001 when the policy was adopted, because the interpretation is not inconsistent with the text of the policy. Kine v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 419 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan's text limits application of a Rural Industrial plan map designation to three exception areas that were built or committed to rural industrial use before the county enacted planning and zoning, the county must first amend the comprehensive plan text to expand the eligible areas for the Rural Industrial plan map designation before applying that designation to properties that are not within the three exception areas. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 441 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. LUBA is not required to affirm a county's interpretation of an exception to Goal 4 that is part of the county's comprehensive plan, where that interpretation is contrary to the exception statutes at ORS 197.732, Goal 2, and the rule that implements Goal 2 at OAR 660-004-0018. ORS 197.829(1)(d). Hood River Valley Residents v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 452 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county's interpretation of an irrevocably committed exception as allowing all uses on the exception site that are allowed in the zone that was applied to the site when the exception was approved is inconsistent with the ORS 197.732(1)(b) description of an exception as "a comprehensive plan provision that * * * is applicable to specific properties or situations and does not establish a planning or zoning policy of general applicability." Hood River Valley Residents v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 452 (2017).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code provision that implements the Transportation Planning Rule at OAR 660-012-0060 as applying only to an application for a comprehensive plan map amendment, and not applying to an application for planned unit development approval, even if the application for a comprehensive plan amendment is consolidated for review purposes with the PUD application, where that interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language of the provision. Talbott v. City of Happy Valley, 74 Or LUBA 143 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan goal of "protecting and maintaining neighborhoods" is not necessarily violated by a development that will displace five existing houses. A city commission interpretation that the proposal complies with the goal, notwithstanding the loss of the five houses, so long as the proposal will otherwise protect and maintain the nearby neighborhood, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the zoning code does not define "hospital structures" but does separately list "Hospitals" and "Medical and dental clinics, outpatient; [and] infirmary services" as permitted uses, a city does not misconstrue the zoning code by concluding that a "medical office building "does not qualify as a "hospital" and therefore need not have a backup source of electricity, which hospitals are required to have under the zoning code. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan policy calls on the city to "[m]aintain the existing residential housing stock in established older neighborhoods by maintaining existing Comprehensive Plan and zoning designations where appropriate," and the city commission adopts a number of reasons why it believes maintaining existing planning and zoning designations is "not appropriate," a petitioner must do more than set out reasons why he thinks maintaining the existing planning and zoning is appropriate without directly challenging the city commission's reasoning. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan policy requires that a city "ensure that potential loss of affordable housing is replaced" when changing comprehensive plan and zoning map designations, city findings that city-wide efforts to encourage affordable housing will be sufficient to make up for the loss of five dwellings through construction of a medical center made possible under new comprehensive plan and zoning map designations are sufficient to demonstrate the policy will not be violated. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to a governing body's interpretation of a condition of approval imposed by a hearings officer in a prior decision, although deference may be required for any code interpretations the governing body adopts in the course of interpreting the condition of approval. Kuhn v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 190 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm an interpretation of a condition of approval requiring an "agreement" to maintain a common tract, such that the required agreement is not limited to Covenants, Conditions and Restrictions (CC&Rs), where the condition does not expressly limit the agreement to CC&Rs. Kuhn v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 190 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code provision that requires a final plan that is submitted after approval of a concept plan for a planned unit development (PUD) to be "sufficiently detailed to indicate fully the ultimate operation and appearance of the development" to be satisfied by a submittal of plans providing detailed information about the location and size of building envelopes, dwelling heights, and the location of trees, utilities, the driveway, and the retaining wall, without requiring submission of plans and drawing regarding the appearance of the homes to be built on the PUD lots. Harrison v. City of Cannon Beach, 74 Or LUBA 202 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council's implied interpretation of the phrase "in all major respects" as excluding changes that do not qualify as major changes, such as changes in setbacks. Harrison v. City of Cannon Beach, 74 Or LUBA 202 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a local code provision that provides for "final concept approval by the planning commission" to be sent to the city council as requiring that the city council make the final decision on the application whether the planning commission recommends approval or denial of the application, where the text of the provision and context provided by other provisions render the city council's interpretation plausible. Harrison v. City of Cannon Beach, 74 Or LUBA 202 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code provision as not requiring a stage development schedule where a planned unit development is not proposed to be completed in stages and where the text of the provision and context provided by other provisions render the city council's interpretation plausible. Harrison v. City of Cannon Beach, 74 Or LUBA 202 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation that the use category of mass shelter is limited to shelters located in a "building" is inconsistent with the express language of the applicable code provisions, where the code defines "mass shelter" in part as a "structure" containing sleeping areas, and as the code defines "structures," they are not limited to structures that are "buildings." Central Eastside Industrial Council v. City of Portland, 74 Or LUBA 221 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation that a mass shelter's sleeping areas must be located in permanent structures with foundations, and therefore a proposed tent camp that provides sleeping areas within large 10-person tents is not a mass shelter, is inconsistent with the code definition of mass shelter, which does not require that a mass shelter's sleeping areas be located in permanent structures with foundations. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. City of Portland, 74 Or LUBA 221 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation that a proposed tent camp is not a "mass shelter" because the campers, rather than the tent camp operators, will provide sleeping pads is not consistent with the applicable text and definitions, which do not turn on who provides sleeping pads that shelter residents will sleep on. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. City of Portland, 74 Or LUBA 221 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is inconsistent with the purpose of a code prohibition on mass shelters in an industrial zone to approve, as an outright permitted "Community Service" use, a tent camp that is functionally identical to a mass shelter. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. City of Portland, 74 Or LUBA 221 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city code excludes from the use category of "Community Service" any uses where tenancy is arranged on a month-to-month basis or longer period, a city errs in concluding that a proposed tent camp, which allows indefinite and potentially permanent tenancy by campers and staff, is a Community Service use allowed outright in an industrial zone. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. City of Portland, 74 Or LUBA 221 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is required to affirm a city council's interpretation of a code provision that requires adequate street size and capacity as allowing a short-term temporal separation between the opening of a proposed store and completion of mitigation measures that will address all deficiencies in an impacted off-site facility, where petitioners do not develop any argument that the interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the regulation. Martin v. City of Central Point, 74 Or LUBA 312 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The larger size of a 5,000-square-foot structure in a forest zone is not determinative of whether it can be correctly viewed as "accessory" to a 3,600-square-foot residence. Kaplowitz v. Lane County, 74 Or LUBA 386 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Whether a proposed use is properly viewed as "accessory" to an existing residential use in a forest zone calls for a subjective judgment. Where a use began as an unauthorized use with a commercial component, and the commercial component is relocated to another site, a hearings official determines a number of limits imposed on the use are sufficient to ensure it is "accessory," and the board of commissioners adopts the hearings official's interpretation as its own, LUBA will defer to that interpretation under ORS 197.829(1). Kaplowitz v. Lane County, 74 Or LUBA 386 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reject a petitioner's challenge that a city's findings fail to demonstrate that allowing higher density residential development in an existing area of low density residential development, instead of in areas already planned for dense development, is consistent with a comprehensive plan policy encouraging compact development, where the petitioner fails to challenge the city council's interpretation of the policy as encouraging compact development in all areas of the city, not just in areas most suitable for high density development. Kine v. City of Bend, 74 Or LUBA 403 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's findings that a site has "good access" to an arterial, because it is within a one-third-mile drive from an arterial and has direct pedestrian and bicycle access to the arterial, are sufficient to establish consistency with a comprehensive plan policy requiring "good access to an arterial," particularly given the subjective nature of the policy. Kine v. City of Bend, 74 Or LUBA 403 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy requiring that medium density residential development be located "near commercial services and employment" as being satisfied by a location near some commercial services and employment, but not necessarily a comprehensive range of commercial services and employment, is plausible and not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Kine v. City of Bend, 74 Or LUBA 403 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a county commissioners' interpretation of a code variance standard is arguably inconsistent with language found on the county's variance application form does not demonstrate that the commissioners' interpretation is inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy underlying the standard, under ORS 197.829(1). Neil v. Columbia County, 74 Or LUBA 442 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. A county is not bound to interpret its local variance standards in the same manner as traditional variance standards, and can plausibly interpret its "extraordinary hardship" standard to include considerations beyond the physical characteristics of the subject property. Neil v. Columbia County, 74 Or LUBA 442 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. How to determine whether a proposed zoning diagram is consistent with the comprehensive plan, based on trying to match surveyed lines to features depicted on the plan map, is a mixed question of law and fact, involving interpretation of the comprehensive plan map. LUBA owes no deference to a hearings officer's interpretation of the comprehensive plan map, or the interpretative exercise of selecting which plan map features to match with surveyed lines. Laurel Hill Valley Citizens v. City of Eugene, 73 Or LUBA 140 (2016).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city governing body's code interpretation to the effect that a vested right to complete what will be a nonconforming use is lost through discontinuance, if the applicant makes no effort toward completion of the use during a 12-month period, where that interpretation is consistent with the express language, purpose and policy underlying the code provision. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Hood River, 72 Or LUBA 1 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council does not misconstrue a development code limitation that a temporary use permit may not "be issued for a period exceeding 180 days in any 365 day period" to require a single period of 180 days and not allow the holder of the permit to operate for up to 180 nonconsecutive days in any 365-day period. Bend/Sisters Garden RV Resort, LLC v. City of Sisters, 72 Or LUBA 200 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of a development code limitation that a temporary use permit may not "be issued for a period exceeding 180 days in any 365 day period" to require that the 180-day period begin on the date the permit is issued has the effect of omitting the "in any 365 day period" language and reading in a requirement that the start date for the 180 days must be the date the permit is issued. That interpretation is therefore inconsistent with the express language of the 180-day limit. Bend/Sisters Garden RV Resort, LLC v. City of Sisters, 72 Or LUBA 200 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a county governing body's interpretation of two provisions of the county's zoning code that describe certain uses in similar, but not identical, terms as describing different uses, where the interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language of the two provisions. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 72 Or LUBA 240 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county establishes that an applicable county code provision does not implement the Airport Planning Rule at OAR 660-013-0080, LUBA will affirm a county governing body's interpretation of an undefined phrase "meeting place" in the applicable provision, where the interpretation is consistent with the plain ordinary meaning of the phrase and is not inconsistent with any of the express language of the county's code. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 72 Or LUBA 240 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the relevant planning documents submitted to comply with the Goal 5 administrative rule requirement for an inventory of significant mineral and aggregate resource sites are all ambiguous, and none of those documents clearly states that they are an inventory of significant mineral and aggregate resource sites, a board of county commissioners' interpretation that an inventory that was submitted for acknowledgment by LCDC showed both "significant" mineral and aggregate sites and mineral and aggregate sites for which there was not enough information to complete Goal 5 planning is not "inconsistent with the express language of the comprehensive plan," and therefore is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1)(a). Where the other bases that would also authorize LUBA to reverse the interpretation set out in ORS 197.829(1)(b), (c), and (d) also do not apply, LUBA must affirm the interpretation. Delta Property Company, LLC v. Lane County, 72 Or LUBA 250 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where LUBA sustains three assignments of error, but denies a fourth assignment of error, rejecting petitioner's challenge to a county commissioners' interpretation that a permit expiration standard that requires a finding that the applicant is not at fault for failing to complete the use authorized by the permit is met because the county's multi-stage destination resort process is so complicated, and LUBA's decision is reversed on appeal, with the Court of Appeals concluding that making the complexity of the multi-stage resort process the only consideration in applying the standard is an implausible interpretation of the standard, LUBA will sustain the fourth assignment of error as well. Gould v. Deschutes County, 72 Or LUBA 258 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a standard that permits the base zoning building height maximum to be increased if the "increased height is consistent with the purposes" of the applicable plan district's height limits, but does not expressly require that the proposed height increase must be consistent with all of the purposes or that each of the purposes operates as an approval criterion, a city council interpretation that the proposed height increase does not have to be consistent with all the purposes and that the individual purposes do not apply separately as approval criteria does not insert or omit text from the zoning code, in contravention of ORS 174.010. Preserve the Pearl, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 261 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city council explains that interpreting a standard that requires that a proposal to increase building height to be consistent with a list of purposes requires consistency with all of those purposes is not possible, which would render the plan designation that makes an area of the city eligible for such building height increases a nullity, that explanation provides contextual support for the city council's interpretation that the proposed building height increase need only be consistent with the purposes on balance. Preserve the Pearl, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 261 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where contextual requirements are written in terms of standards or criteria, all of which must be met, but the disputed standard merely requires that a proposed height increase be consistent with the purposes set out in the applicable height limit section of the code, that context supports the city's interpretation that the proposed height increase need not be consistent with all of the purposes and that the purposes do not operate as individual approval criteria. Preserve the Pearl, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 261 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of the code-defined term "structure" as including a parking lot is not inconsistent with the definition of "structure" or the express language of the city's land use regulations or comprehensive plan provisions. The use of the same word in the city's buildings and construction code that is not a part of the city's acknowledged land use regulations is not relevant context for determining whether the city improperly construed the word structure to include a parking lot. Knapp v. City of Jacksonville, 72 Or LUBA 299 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a code provision requiring notice to all parties to a land use proceeding that the members of the governing body intend to conduct a site visit "with any party or his representative," as requiring notice only when the members of the governing body expect to conduct the site visit with a party, and not to require notice where a safety escort is unexpectedly provided during the site visit. Stop the Dump Coalition v. Yamhill County, 72 Or LUBA 341 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a potentially dispositive issue under a zoning code requirement that development be served by public facilities is whether a private septic system qualifies as "public facilities," LUBA will reject arguments in respondent's brief that the city council relied on a comprehensive plan definition of "public facilities" that might be broad enough to include private septic systems as public facilities, where nothing in the city council's decision suggests the city council relied on the comprehensive plan definition. Pennock v. City of Bandon, 72 Or LUBA 379 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. For an implied interpretation of a local standard to be adequate for review, the findings embodying the interpretation must carry one possible meaning of the ambiguous language in the standard, and an easily inferred explanation of that meaning. A finding that proposed rezoning to higher density residential use is consistent with a plan policy that requires "good access" to an arterial because the property is located near a minor arterial does not embody an implied interpretation adequate for review to the effect that "good access" is satisfied by physical proximity of the property to the arterial, regardless of the quality of access to that arterial. Kine v. City of Bend, 72 Or LUBA 423 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA's review of planning commission interpretations is governed by ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D), rather than by ORS 197.829(1). And under ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D), LUBA must determine whether the planning commission "[i]mproperly construed the applicable law," "without according the deference required by Clark[v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 515, 836 P2d 710 (1992)]." Gage v. City of Portland, 319 Or 308, 317, 877 P2d 1187 (1994). S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under the law of the case principle articulated in Beck v. City of Tillamook, 313 Or 148, 831 P2d 678 (1992), the parties in a LUBA appeal of a decision following LUBA's remand of an earlier decision may not revisit legal issues that were resolved by LUBA in the prior appeal. Where the board of county commissioners could have reviewed the first decision and resolved interpretive issues differently than the hearings officer did in the first decision, but did not do so prior to the first LUBA appeal, the board of commissioners may not revisit resolved interpretive issues in the decision following remand and is not entitled to the deferential standard of review required by ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010) in the second appeal. Gould v. Deschutes County, 71 Or LUBA 78 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. As a general proposition, a board of commissioners is free to interpret its land use regulations. But a hearings officer would not be free to interpret county land use regulations differently than LUBA did following a LUBA remand of the hearings officer's initial decision, and the board of commissioners is also not free to do so in a local appeal of the hearings officer's decision following LUBA's remand. Gould v. Deschutes County, 71 Or LUBA 78 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a board of commissioners' interpretation of its comprehensive plan that an Airport Master Plan adopted as part of the comprehensive plan is not a source of approval criteria for proposed airport development, where that interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language of the provisions of the county's development code that implement the Airport Master Plan or the county's transportation system plan that describes the Airport Master Plan. The Flight Shop, Inc. v. Deschutes County, 71 Or LUBA 141 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a board of commissioners' interpretation of the purpose statement for the county's Airport Development Zone that refers to "consisten[cy] with" the airport master plan as merely reciting a conclusion that the zone is consistent with the airport master plan, and not requiring independent review of development in the zone for consistency with the airport master plan. The Flight Shop, Inc. v. Deschutes County, 71 Or LUBA 141 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation that a code "Definition of Village Character" is not a mandatory permit approval standard, and that village character is achieved through compliance with substantive code standards that follow the definition, is consistent with the text and context of the code, where the code standards that follow the definition all state "village character" will be created or enhanced "by" or "through" "compliance with the following" "requirements," "criteria" or "design standards." LO 138 LLC v. City of Lake Oswego, 71 Or LUBA 195 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A petitioner's argument that a city's code requires that proposed development be compared with the width and length of buildings on adjoining lots, in addition to height, to ensure the proposed development is "small scale" will be rejected where petitioner cites no code language that requires that the proposed development must be directly compared with adjoining development, petitioner cites nothing to support its contention that width and length must invariably be considered in addition to height, and the code is reasonably interpreted to achieve "village character" through standards set out in the code, rather than through a direct comparison of the proposed development with surrounding development. LO 138 LLC v. City of Lake Oswego, 71 Or LUBA 195 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In applying a conditional use "compatibility" standard that requires consideration of the "operating characteristics of the use," a local government does not err in considering the safety of the use. Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where county zoning ordinance language replicates and was adopted to implement Goal 4 and LCDC's Goal 4 administrative rule, the board of county commissioner's interpretation of that zoning ordinance language is not entitled to deferential review under ORS 197.829(1) and is instead reviewed under ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D) to determine if the board of commissioners "improperly construed the applicable law." Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A board of county commissioners' interpretation of a zoning standard that requires that a proposed natural gas pipeline must "not limit the potential for more intensive use of the area" as being violated by the proposal unless the pipeline results in "no restrictions" on more intensive uses is neither inconsistent with the text of the zoning standard nor implausible and therefore is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 260-61, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A board of commissioners correctly interprets a zoning standard that requires that a "project's" public benefits outweigh expected adverse impacts to (1) limit consideration to the pipeline for which county permit approval is sought and (2) exclude any public benefits that may be generated by the LNG terminal that would be located in, and require the separate approval of, a city located in the county. The permit applicant's position that the county should consider the benefits of the LNG terminal but not the LNG terminal's expected adverse impacts is incorrect, because "project" cannot mean one thing when considering benefits and something else when considering expected adverse impacts. Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code provision requiring that a home occupation shall not utilize over 600 square feet of floor area cannot plausibly be interpreted to limit only the square feet physically occupied by a truck or trailer as part of a home occupation to perform maintenance work on trucks and trailers. Because the home occupation activity is the maintenance and not the storage of trucks and trailers, any interpretation that ignores the square footage necessary for employees to perform maintenance tasks is not consistent with the text of the code provision. Stevens v. City of Island City, 71 Or LUBA 275 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm as plausible a governing body's interpretation of a code provision requiring a geologic assessment where development cannot be accomplished without measures to "mitigate or control" the risk of geologic hazard, to trigger the need for a geologic assessment only if the development activity itself causes the risk of geologic hazard to increase above its pre-development state, and to not require geologic assessment simply because the applicant proposes measures, such as planting vegetation, intended to reduce existing landslide risk below the pre-development state. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 71 Or LUBA 297 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code provision specifying the requirements for design and construction of transportation facilities as allowing the city to approve the creation of a public right-of-way by deed where the city council's interpretation is not inconsistent with the text of the provision and relevant context provided by other provisions, and is plausible. Truth in Site Coalition v. City of Bend, 71 Or LUBA 348 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of the undefined term "project" as being limited to property that an applicant controls, notwithstanding evidence in the record demonstrating plans to develop more properties, where the city council's interpretation is not inconsistent with the text of the provision, relevant context provided by other provisions, or the purpose statement for the provision, and is plausible. Truth in Site Coalition v. City of Bend, 71 Or LUBA 348 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code provision regulating when master planned development approval is required as not applying where no land division is proposed, and the interpretation is not inconsistent with the text of the provision. Truth in Site Coalition v. City of Bend, 71 Or LUBA 348 (2015).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a local government's conclusion that an application to modify a condition of approval imposed in a prior decision does not propose dredging or filling, where no ground disturbing activity of any kind is proposed that differs from the ground disturbing activity approved in the prior decision. McCaffree v. Coos County, 70 Or LUBA 15 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county governing body's unexplained decision to rely on the on-line Merriam-Webster Dictionary definition of the term "penstock" does not constitute an interpretation that is adequate for review, where the governing body's decision does not show it was a considered choice between possible definitions. Pacificorp v. Deschutes County, 70 Or LUBA 89 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government approves an asphalt parking lot under a historic site review standard requiring that proposed development conform with the "character" of the historic district, LUBA will affirm the local government's interpretation that an asphalt parking lot conforms to the character of the district, because asphalt is a common building material in the district, even if asphalt paving is not itself a described feature of the historic district. Knapp v. City of Jacksonville, 70 Or LUBA 259 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of its comprehensive plan as not requiring consistency review for individual quasi-judicial land use applications where the interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language of the comprehensive plan policy or any other provision of the comprehensive plan, or with any purpose or policy underlying the policy. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm under ORS 197.829(1) a local governing body's interpretation of the term "areas" as synonymous with the property that is the subject of the rezoning application, where the interpretation is not inconsistent with any express language of the county's comprehensive plan or land use regulations. Ooten v. Clackamas County, 70 Or LUBA 338 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government correctly construes its local code as not requiring an applicant for a plan amendment and zone change that would have the effect of legalizing some uses of the property to demonstrate compliance with code provisions governing nonconforming uses. Ooten v. Clackamas County, 70 Or LUBA 338 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council's determination that a good faith effort to lease an historic building is sufficient to satisfy a historic resource demolition permit standard requiring the applicant to demonstrate a good faith effort to "sell" the resource, where the city's findings explain that only the structure, and not the underlying land, is a designated historic resource, the city lacks authority to require the owner to sell the land, and the structure cannot be relocated intact. Rushing v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 448 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city code limits the maximum number of parking spaces, and requires that parking must be provided on the same lot as the building served, or on an off-site lot within 500 feet of the building, a hearings officer misconstrues the code to allow parking spaces that are intended to serve hospital campus buildings that are located more than 500 feet away, under the theory that the various lots that make up the hospital campus constitute a single "lot" and the various buildings of the hospital campus a single development, where nothing in the code provides that the hospital campus is a single lot or constitutes a single development for off-street parking purposes. SCAN v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 468 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer does not misconstrue a site plan review standard requiring a finding that "negative impacts to the transportation system are mitigated adequately" as not requiring the applicant to construct bike lanes that are shown in the Bicycle System Element of the city's Transportation System Plan (TSP), where the code standard does not refer to the TSP or indicate that site plan review is the vehicle to provide for construction of bike lanes depicted in the TSP. SCAN v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 468 (2014).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan provision is ambiguous if it can be interpreted in more than one way. Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 76 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan policy that requires the city to extend "key urban services and facilities in an orderly and efficient manner" is relevant context for interpreting a comprehensive plan provision that requires the local government to design and locate public and private facilities such as cellular communications towers in a manner that "preserves and enhances desirable features of local and neighborhood areas" and "promotes their sense of identity," where the two policies deal with the same subject matter. Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 76 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a staff code interpretation to the effect that a district-specific density transfer provision governing single-family development in single-family zones does not supersede or conflict with a general city-wide density transfer provision applicable to multi-family development in multi-family zones, where the two density transfer provisions would never apply to the same development, and therefore would not create incompatibility or conflict, such that the specific would control the general. Sellwood-Moreland Improvement League v. City of Portland, 68 Or LUBA 213 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a local government's interpretation of the provisions of its comprehensive plan that implement Goal 17 to be as protective as, but not more protective than, Goal 17, where the text of the comprehensive plan provisions make clear that the local government did not intend to regulate coastal shorelands more protectively than Goal 17. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 68 Or LUBA 233 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is required under ORS 197.829(1) to affirm a local government's interpretation of a provision of its comprehensive plan that identifies the location of the coastal shorelands boundary as "the top of the seacliff along the seacliff shoreline" as a "general guide as to the location of the [boundary]" rather than a specific minimum elevation, where the interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language of the provision or the comprehensive plan map, and is plausible. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 68 Or LUBA 233 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Goal 17 provides in part that coastal shorelands must include "adjacent areas of geologic instability where the geologic instability is related to or will impact a coastal water body[.]" In order to be consistent with Goal 17, a cliff erosion geologic hazard analysis that is relied on to determine the location of the coastal shorelands boundary must consider geologic instability from all causes of cliff erosion where the cliff erosion could impact the ocean. A geologic hazard analysis that does not analyze "adjacent areas of geologic instability" from causes of erosion other than waves hitting the shore cannot be relied on to locate the boundary consistent with Goal 17. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 68 Or LUBA 233 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Goal 17 requires in part that coastal shorelands must include "lands within 100 feet of the ocean shore[.]" A county decision that locates the coastal shorelands boundary at the top of the beach and at the bottom or mid-point of shorefront cliffs is inconsistent with Goal 17, because such locations are arguably where the "ocean shore," as defined in ORS 390.605(2), ends and that interpretation gives little or no depth to the coastal shorelands boundary beyond the "ocean shore" in some places. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 68 Or LUBA 233 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. Where a local government interprets a land use regulation requirement for a geologic permit not to apply to an application for approval of a transportation impact analysis that does not propose any development, and that interpretation is consistent with the text of the land use regulation, LUBA is required to affirm the interpretation. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Newport, 68 Or LUBA 318 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code standard requiring that a proposed facility is "consistent with the overall needs of the community" to also include consideration of impacts/benefits on citizens of adjoining cities, where that broad understanding of "community" is not inconsistent with the text, context, purpose or policy underlying the standard. STOP Tigard Oswego Project, LLC v. City of West Linn, 68 Or LUBA 360 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An argument that a city council misconstrued a "mitigate permanent disturbances" standard to apply only to disturbances to the surface of wetlands does not provide a basis for remand, where fairly read the city council findings apply the standard to evaluate disturbances to the soils and water column that constitute a wetland, and conclude that placing a pipe underground in the bedrock 34 to 60 feet below the wetland would not cause permanent disturbance to the wetland. STOP Tigard Oswego Project, LLC v. City of West Linn, 68 Or LUBA 360 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code standard requiring mitigation of "permanent disturbances" to water resource areas, to require no mitigation when a proposed pipeline is laid across a culvert within the paved area of a street, and thus would result in no additional impacts on the water resource, where the interpretation is consistent with the text and apparent purpose of the standard to minimize impacts on water resource areas. STOP Tigard Oswego Project, LLC v. City of West Linn, 68 Or LUBA 360 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 197.829(1)(d) effectively obligates a local government to interpret an ambiguous code provision if possible in a manner not contrary to the applicable statewide planning goals and administrative rules, not only where the code provision directly implements a goal or rule protecting resource lands, but also where the code provision is a general provision applicable to all zones, including resource zones, and is not intended to implement any particular goal or rule. White v. Lane County, 68 Or LUBA 423 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In approving a wedding venue and event business in a forest zone under a code provision that allows, on a "temporary" basis, uses otherwise not allowable in the applicable zone, a county must consider whether the proposed use is properly characterized as a "home occupation," which is an allowed conditional use in the forest zone, subject to restrictions. If the proposed is properly characterized as a home occupation allowable in the forest zone, then the code does not allow the county to issue a temporary use permit for that use. White v. Lane County, 68 Or LUBA 423 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county errs in approving a five-year renewable permit for an existing wedding venue and event business as a "temporary" use, without considering whether the use is "temporary" as defined under the county code, i.e., something that exists only for a limited, transitory interval, and whether conditions are necessary to limit the duration of the use to ensure that it is in fact a "temporary" use. White v. Lane County, 68 Or LUBA 423 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county errs in interpreting a code provision to allow temporary use of an "existing structure" even if the structure was recently and illegally built for a use prohibited in the zone, where the text and context of the temporary use provisions suggest that temporary use of an "existing structure" is intended for a lawful structure, and the county's broader interpretation brings the code into conflict with nonconforming use statutes. White v. Lane County, 68 Or LUBA 423 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A decision that determines that ORS 215.301 does not prohibit batching operations at an existing mining site because a 1981 permit authorized batching operations on the subject property is not dicta, and a petitioner may challenge the conclusion in an appeal of the decision, where the decision purports to foreclose future challenges to a batching operation under the statute. Poto v. Linn County, 67 Or LUBA 162 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county has specific procedures for identifying and resolving development code violations and appeals from those procedures are to circuit court, LUBA will sustain a county's interpretation that it is not obligated to review a decision by a county enforcement officer that a property is not in violation of the development code as part of a permit application for a home occupation on the property that was the subject of the enforcement officer's decision. Green v. Douglas County, 67 Or LUBA 234 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When the governing body declines review of a planning commission decision, the planning commission's interpretations can be imputed to the governing body only if the governing body affirmed, adopted or incorporated the planning commission's decision as its own. CRAW v. City of Warrenton, 67 Or LUBA 263 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The intent to affirm, adopt or incorporate a planning commission's decision as the governing body's own decision must be expressly stated in the decision. Oral statements by individual members of the governing body indicating general approval of the planning commission decision are not a sufficient basis to input the interpretations of the planning commission to the governing body. CRAW v. City of Warrenton, 67 Or LUBA 263 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city staff interpretation that a site design review permit is not a "development permit" subject to certain submittal requirements because site design review does not directly authorize any alteration of land is inconsistent with the applicable text and context, where under that interpretation none of the city's discretionary or nondiscretionary permits qualify as development permits, leaving the category of development permits an empty set. CRAW v. City of Warrenton, 67 Or LUBA 263 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code provision prohibiting the location of loading docks on a building side that faces the highway is not concerned with the orientation of the loading docks, but the orientation of the building side. The code provision is not met by a loading dock located against an L-shaped façade with the long axis facing the highway. CRAW v. City of Warrenton, 67 Or LUBA 263 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a county governing body's interpretation of standards governing placement of fill and levees in different areas of the flood plain as allowing fills and levees in the "flood fringe" area as long as the fill or levee does not increase the base flood level by one foot and does not extend from the "flood fringe" into the "floodway," which regulates fill and levees more stringently. Protect Grand Island Farms v. Yamhill County, 67 Or LUBA 278 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a rezoning standard originated in a city/county agreement but was later adopted as part of the city's comprehensive plan and land use regulations, the city's interpretation of that rezoning standard is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Mintz v. City of Beaverton, 67 Or LUBA 374 (2013).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Despite a reasonably strong textual and contextual argument in support of a different interpretation, a city's interpretation of the phrase "facilities operating at 1,000 watts [Effective Radiated Power] ERP or less" that ERP should be calculated by channel and not by antenna is not inconsistent with the express language of the city's regulation or with the purpose of the regulation, and is required to be affirmed, where the meaning of the key term used in the provision at issue, "facility," is not clear, is not defined in the code, and the dictionary definition of the word is not particularly helpful in discerning the intent of the city in enacting the provision. ORS 197.829(1)(a). Hill v. City of Portland, 66 Or LUBA 250 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of comprehensive plan policies that "encourage" alternative energy sources, to allow the county to adopt restrictions on development of wind energy facilities to protect other uses, as long as such restrictions do not preclude the siting of wind energy facilities, because the interpretation is consistent with the text of the comprehensive plan policies. Hatley v. Umatilla County, 66 Or LUBA 265 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council's interpretation of a standard requiring that the proposed road vacation be in the public interest, to the effect that "public interest" can include benefits flowing from development facilitated by the road vacation, not limited to the road vacation itself, where nothing in the text suggests limits on what considerations inform whether the vacation is in the public interest. Conte v. City of Eugene, 66 Or LUBA 334 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a planning director's interpretation that site design review standards do not apply to a proposed landfill expansion because the expansion was authorized in a 1980 decision that pre-dated the site design review standards, where nothing in the code compels application of the site design review standards to an already authorized landfill expansion. McPhillips Farm Inc. v. Yamhill County, 66 Or LUBA 355 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city planning commission interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy does not apply to a planned unit development application for a cell tower is correct where the text of the policy directs the city to implement one of several means of protecting open space, including adopting planned unit development ordinances, and does not contain any language that suggests that it is intended to apply on a case-by-case basis to individual applications for planned unit development approval that are processed under the city's adopted planned unit development ordinances. Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 83 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city planning commission interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy does not apply to a planned unit development application to site a cell tower is not correct, where (1) the text of the policy provides specific and mandatory direction that public facilities "be designed and located" to "preserve[] and enhance" desirable features of the area, (2) the preamble to the applicable comprehensive plan policy refers to "daily decisions" being guided by "site planning," and (3) there is no similar provision in the city's development code that requires the city to consider whether the design and location of a public facility "preserve[s] and enhance[s] desirable features of the area." Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 83 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city planning commission's interpretation of a code provision that requires "adequate screening" as requiring screening of a 75-foot-tall cell tower to a reasonable extent and its conclusion that screening the bottom two thirds of a 75-foot-tall tower is sufficient to provide "adequate screening" are correct, given the inherently subjective nature of a criterion that requires "adequate screening." Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 83 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. Where a proposed cell tower meets the objective standards set out in the city's code for telecommunications towers and where the tower will be screened from view while still allowing the tower to function as intended, LUBA will uphold a city's conclusion that the proposed cell tower is "reasonably compatible and harmonious" with the neighborhood, particularly given the inherently subjective nature of the criterion. Northgreen Property LLC v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 83 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That the county initially adopted a problematic interpretation of the criteria for applying a limited use overlay zone to limit uses allowed on land for which a reasons exception is taken does not provide a basis for reversal or remand, where the county adopted an alternative interpretation that is consistent with the text of the zone change criteria. Devin Oil Co. v. Morrow County, 65 Or LUBA 104 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a code standard allowing imposition of a limited use overlay zone if "it is required to limit the uses permitted in the proposed zone" by the reasons exception rule at OAR chapter 660, division 4, to employ the overlay zone to limit uses to ensure consistency with Statewide Planning Goal 12 (Transportation), and the need to take an exception to Goal 12, even though the county took reasons exceptions only to other statewide planning goals, where the county's interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose or underlying policy of the code standard. Devin Oil Co. v. Morrow County, 65 Or LUBA 104 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a local code provision to require only consideration of current adequacy of transportation facilities, notwithstanding local traffic analysis guidelines that require analysis of impacts from future planned uses, where the county interprets the guidelines to be non-mandatory, and that interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy of the relevant local provisions. Devin Oil Co. v. Morrow County, 65 Or LUBA 104 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although city governing body interpretations are entitled to considerable deference under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 259, 243 P3d 776 (2010), where there is no reviewable express or implied interpretation, LUBA has nothing to defer to. Heitsch v. City of Salem, 65 Or LUBA 187 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance allows "Government Services" uses if they are not "specifically listed" uses in other zoning districts, a city council is within its interpretive discretion under Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 259, 243 P3d 776 (2010), when it concludes that a VA outpatient clinic is allowable as a Government Services use, notwithstanding that "Medical Health Facilities" are allowed in some city zones. Because the VA outpatient clinic would offer a variety of services some of which are not offered by the typical private and public clinics that would be allowed as "Medical Health Facilities," the VA outpatient clinic is not a "specifically listed" use in any zoning district. Randazzo v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 272 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a code provision allowing rezoning when "zoning previously adopted for the area was in error" to focus on the parcel to be rezoned rather than the surrounding area is consistent with the text of the provision, and will be affirmed. O'Brien v. Lincoln County, 65 Or LUBA 286 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a sub-area comprehensive plan map designates an area as "Medium and High Density" does not imply an intent to limit density below the maximum density otherwise allowed under the area's general comprehensive plan map designation and zoning. Conte v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 326 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Sub-area plan language describing as a "buffer" the neighborhood that includes property proposed for rezoning from a high density residential to a higher density residential zone need not be interpreted to limit density to no more than the median density between the two zones. A planning commission does not err in concluding that the proposed rezone is consistent with the "buffer" description based on other density, height and design restrictions. Conte v. City of Eugene, 65 Or LUBA 326 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will not defer to an interpretation of a zoning ordinance that appears only in a city's reply brief and is inconsistent with an implied interpretation that is included in the city council's decision on appeal. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Dunes City, 65 Or LUBA 358 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city council interprets a local code provision that requires the city to determine that the "[p]ublic benefits of the use outweigh any impacts that cannot be mitigated" as not requiring the city to determine whether there is a public need for the use, the city council's interpretation is not inconsistent with the express language of the provision, and LUBA will affirm that interpretation. ORS 197.829(1); Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010). Cottonwood Capital Property Mgmt. LLC v. City of Portland, 65 Or LUBA 370 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation that granting an adjustment to a requirement that vehicle access to mining and waste related uses be from Major City Traffic Streets to allow access from a Truck Access Street, because the adjustment "will equally or better meet the purpose of the regulation to be modified" is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), where it is clear that the proposed access street has ample access to carrying the expected traffic and that therefore the adjustment meets the purposes of the regulation, to reduce impacts and nuisances and transportation impacts from mining and waste related uses. Cottonwood Capital Property Mgmt. LLC v. City of Portland, 65 Or LUBA 370 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Because the legislature in adopting ORS 197.829(1) both codified and modified the holding in Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), the legislature may have intended ORS 197.829(1) to be a comprehensive statement of the circumstances under which the Clark deferential standard of review is applied to a governing body's local code interpretations, and did not intend LUBA to extend the reasoning in Clark to circumstances not covered by the statute, such as a governing body's interpretation of the text of a prior land use decision adopted by the planning commission. Hood River Citizens for a Local Economy v. City of Hood River, 65 Or LUBA 392 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will sustain a city council interpretation of a 1991 planning commission site plan decision to approve both a 70,000-square-foot retail store and a 30,000-square-foot "future expansion" area, notwithstanding a condition that refers only to approval of the retail store, where the site plan depicts both improvements, the 1991 decision approves the "site plan" without restriction, and the record indicates that the planning commission intended to approve both improvements. Hood River Citizens for a Local Economy v. City of Hood River, 65 Or LUBA 392 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will sustain a city council interpretation of a site plan condition of approval to impose no limits on the type merchandise sold at a retail store that is allowed outright in the applicable zone, where the condition authorizes sale of "general merchandise, to include" listed examples, and the fairest reading of the condition is that the list of examples is illustrative, not exclusive. Hood River Citizens for a Local Economy v. City of Hood River, 65 Or LUBA 392 (2012).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a communication tower arguably qualifies as either a heavily regulated wireless communication facility or a lightly regulated utility, a local government interpretation that the tower qualifies as a utility is not inconsistent with the underlying policy of the land use regulation, where the land use regulation has two underlying policies—one that favors heavily regulating private wireless communication facilities and one that emphasizes health, safety and emergency functions of publicly owned utilities. Thielemann v. City of Medford, 64 Or LUBA 8 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a land use regulation provides that a Wireless Communication Support Structure is operated by a Wireless Communication Provider and defines a Wireless Communication Provider as "a person or company in the business of designing, installing, marketing and maintaining wireless communication systems and services," a city correctly concludes that a police department communication tower is not a Wireless Communication Support Structure, because the police department uses the wireless communication system for its own purposes and does not provide wireless services. Thielemann v. City of Medford, 64 Or LUBA 8 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance expressly excludes communication towers from zoning height limits but does not expressly exclude communication towers from zoning setback requirements, a city errs by interpreting the zoning ordinance to exclude communication towers from zoning setback requirements simply because the setback requirement is calculated based on the tower's height. Thielemann v. City of Medford, 64 Or LUBA 8 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The underlying purpose of a setback requirement that increases by one-half foot for every foot a structure's height exceeds 15 feet is to ensure that taller structures are set back farther than shorter structures. Interpreting an express zoning ordinance exemption for communication towers from building height limits to include an unexpressed exemption from the setback requirement is inconsistent with that underlying purpose. Thielemann v. City of Medford, 64 Or LUBA 8 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer incorrectly interprets a code standard that requires a proposed modification to an approved tentative planned unit development (PUD) to be "consistent with the conditions of the original approval" by determining that the proposed modification is consistent with modified versions of the original conditions of approval that were imposed in connection with a concurrent application for final PUD approval. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 24 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer incorrectly interprets a code standard that requires a proposal to modify an approved planned unit development (PUD) to demonstrate that the modification proposal is "consistent with the conditions of the original approval," where nothing in the language of the code section allows the hearings officer to overlook inconsistency with the original approved PUD conditions simply because the modification proposes to eliminate the portion of the development that led to the conditions. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 24 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code standard for final planned unit development (PUD) approval that allows the city to "approve [a final PUD] with conditions" does not allow the city to overlook nonconformance with conditions of the Tentative PUD approval and approve a Final PUD that does not comply with the original Tentative PUD conditions of approval by conditioning that Final PUD approval on future satisfaction of those Tentative PUD conditions. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 24 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a planned unit development approval standard requiring that mixed-use development be "constructed before or concurrently with" commercial development, to the effect that the concurrency standard is satisfied by conditions that allow the commercial development to be completed and become operational regardless of whether the mixed-use development is ever constructed, is inconsistent with the express language of the planned unit development standard. Keep Keizer Livable v. City of Keizer, 64 Or LUBA 53 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the plain purpose of a code standard requiring that mixed-use development be "constructed before or concurrently with" commercial development is to prevent circumstances where the constructed commercial development is in place without the required mixed-use development, a governing body's interpretation that allows the commercial development to be constructed and operational without ensuring that the mixed-use development is ever constructed is inconsistent with the purpose of the code provision, and therefore that interpretation is reversible under ORS 197.829(1)(b), even if the interpretation is not inconsistent with the code standard's express language. Keep Keizer Livable v. City of Keizer, 64 Or LUBA 53 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In analyzing a proposal for "compliance" or "consistency" with applicable criteria, ultimately the city must determine whether the proposal "satisfies" the applicable review criteria. Boucot v. City of Corvallis, 64 Or LUBA 131 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of local variance standards is subject to deferential review under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 243 P3d 776 (2010), and the governing body is not bound to follow judicial precedent interpreting traditional variance standards, even if the local variance standards are similar or identical to traditional variance standards. JCK Enterprises LLC v. City of Cottage Grove, 64 Or LUBA 142 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a code variance standard providing that application of the standard to be varied "would result in practical difficulty * * * inconsistent with the objectives of this Code," to the effect that the practical difficulty standard is met even if application of the standard to be varied would be inconsistent with only one relevant code objective, where nothing in the express language of the variance standard requires a determination of inconsistency with all or any particular number of code objectives. JCK Enterprises LLC v. City of Cottage Grove, 64 Or LUBA 142 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a code variance standard providing that application of the standard to be varied "would result in practical difficulty," to the effect that the variance standard is satisfied if circumstances affecting the subject property make it extremely difficult to develop the property with the proposed use otherwise allowed in the zone, even if the property could be developed with other uses allowed in the zone without a variance, is consistent with the text and context of the variance standard and will be affirmed. JCK Enterprises LLC v. City of Cottage Grove, 64 Or LUBA 142 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance requires that a notice of local appeal "include" "a clear and distinct identification of the specific grounds" for appeal and that compliance with that requirement is "jurisdictional," a local government may insist on strict compliance with the zoning ordinance requirements of a local notice of appeal. It is not inconsistent with the text of the zoning ordinance to conclude that a local appeal should be dismissed where the notice of intent to appeal includes no grounds for appeal and instead attempts to incorporate by reference legal issues stated in a different document that was created for a different reason, without attaching a copy of that document. Lang v. City of Ashland, 64 Or LUBA 250 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. For purposes of ORS 197.829, LUBA must recognize as adequate for review a governing body's implicit interpretation of a local approval standard, where the findings and decision carry with it only one possible meaning for the standard and an easily inferred explanation of that meaning. Green v. Douglas County, 245 Or App 430, 263 P3d 355 (2011). Foland v. Jackson County, 64 Or LUBA 265 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A finding that "public facilities exist that are adequate to serve" proposed development is not sufficient to embody a reviewable interpretation of a plan map amendment standard requiring that "adequate public facilities can be provided to the property," where the findings fail to clarify whether the governing body understands the standard to be concerned only with the existence of public facilities in the area with adequate capacity, or whether the standard is also concerned with whether the public facility provider is willing and able to provide services to the property. Foland v. Jackson County, 64 Or LUBA 265 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829(2), where the local government fails to interpret a local standard or adopt a reviewable interpretation, LUBA may interpret the standard in the first instance or remand the decision for the local government for an interpretation. Where the meaning of the local standard is "far from obvious" and the local government is in a better position than LUBA to clarify the meaning through interpretation of context and legislative history, LUBA should exercise its discretion to remand for an interpretation. Green v. Douglas County, 245 Or App 430, 263 P3d 355 (2011). Foland v. Jackson County, 64 Or LUBA 265 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer incorrectly interprets a code requirement that allows a "satellite building or station" to be sited in a residential district only if the satellite building or station will generate "no more trips than a residential use in the same district" to mean that the satellite building or station is allowed if it generates no more trips than the trips generated by the maximum number of detached residences possible under the property's R-6 zoning. Sarathy v. Washington County, 64 Or LUBA 279 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer's interpretation of the phrase "Willamette River" found in the portion of the city's code that implements Statewide Planning Goal 15 (Willamette River Greenway) as meaning only the main channel of the Willamette River is inconsistent with the definition of "Willamette River" set out at ORS 390.310(3), which is referenced in Goal 15 and which defines Willamette River to include all "channels" of the river. Willamette Oaks LLC v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 328 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of its code to allow the setback distance from a wetland to be measured from the city's Goal 5 maps is correct where the applicable language allows the setback to be measured from either the Goal 5 map or a wetland delineation that is provided by the property owner, where a wetland delineation is submitted by an applicant who is not a property owner and is later withdrawn. Willamette Oaks LLC v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 328 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government decision maker considering an application to extend the term of a permit fails to apply local standards that apply to modifications of conditions of approval, based on findings that those standards only apply to modifications of conditions of approval, but the term of the permit is in part imposed by a condition of approval and the decision maker fails to address that fact, LUBA will remand. Bard v. Lane County, 63 Or LUBA 1 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a permit extension may be granted based on a finding that the failure to complete the proposal within the original term of the permit was "for reasons which the applicant was not responsible," a board of county commissioners is within its discretion to interpret that standard to be met if a prudent developer would have delayed construction based on a funding shortfall. The county is also within its interpretive discretion not to require that the applicant explain why it could not have altered its decision to fund the project with donations or why it could not have reallocated other resources to construct the proposal. Bard v. Lane County, 63 Or LUBA 1 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of its code is incomplete and inadequate for review where the decision does not address or interpret key provisions of the code, including code definitions of key terms. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 63 Or LUBA 20 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a "public need and public benefit" standard not to require a weighing of the positive against the negative impacts of proposed mining, and instead to require only that there is a public need for and benefit from the additional supply of aggregate, where that interpretation is consistent with the express language of the code provision. Setniker v. Polk County, 63 Or LUBA 38 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation of a local code provision governing appeals that determines that the consequence for underpayment of an appeal fee is not to dismiss the local appeal but rather to notify the appellant of the underpayment and request prompt payment of the remaining amount due is correct, where nothing in the applicable code section specifies that the consequence for an underpayment of an appeal fee based on misinformation from planning staff is dismissal of a local appeal. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 63 Or LUBA 75 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation that a code phrase "passive use recreational facilities," part of a wetland protection zone that generally prohibits development in wetland setback areas, includes trails and similar recreational facilities, and does not include developed recreational facilities such as an in-ground concrete swimming pool, is consistent with the text and context of the code provision. Bundy v. City of West Linn, 63 Or LUBA 113 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body does not err in concluding that an in-ground concrete swimming pool is a "structure" as that term is defined in the city code, because it has a "fixed connection" to the ground. Bundy v. City of West Linn, 63 Or LUBA 113 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision requires a proposed fueling center to be compatible with the "surrounding area," but the phrase "surrounding area" is not defined in the local code, a local government's interpretation of the phrase "surrounding area" as not requiring consideration of compatibility with a residential area located some distance away from the proposed fueling center must be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1)(a). Leathers Oil Company v. City of Newberg, 63 Or LUBA 176 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a proposed fueling center does not have a "primary pedestrian entrance" or any "large building surfaces," a local government's interpretation of its code provisions that regulate the design of the building features as in applicable to the proposed fueling center is required to be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1) and Siporen v. City of Medford, 349 Or 247, 258, 243 P2d 776 (2010). Leathers Oil Company v. City of Newberg, 63 Or LUBA 176 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer errs in determining that a local code provision that requires that each parcel created by a partition is "suitable for the use intended considering access" is satisfied by a demonstration of satisfaction with a separate code provision that requires each parcel to have "legal access" to a public road, where the two criteria pose different questions. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 63 Or LUBA 288 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city setback reduction criterion requires the city to find that views of the ocean across a currently vacant lot will not be any more "obstructed" with a proposed front yard setback reduction than they would be without that setback reduction. Where it is the construction of the portion of the house that meets all setback requirements that almost entirely obstructs the view of the ocean, a city interpretation that any de minimis impact the proposed front yard setback might have on impaired view of the ocean that will remain through the small side yard does not amount to an "obstruction" is within the city's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1). Burton v. City of Cannon Beach, 63 Or LUBA 300 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a breeding kennel arguably qualifies as animal husbandry, and animal husbandry is a farm use, a local government interpretation that the breeding kennel qualifies as a farm use is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose and policy of the land use regulation. Siegert v. Crook County, 63 Or LUBA 379 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of a local code provision that allows a multi-use path to be constructed in a riparian corridor area if it is "necessary to maintain a functional trail system" is not inconsistent with the express language of any relevant plan or local code provision where a comprehensive plan map depicts a multi-use path within the riparian corridor area, even though the map labels the trail as "conceptual." League of Women Voters v. City of Corvallis, 63 Or LUBA 432 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government errs in denying an application for a use expressly allowed as a conditional use in the applicable zone on the grounds that the proposed conditional use is inconsistent with the purpose of the zone, where no code provision makes the zone purpose statement an applicable approval criterion, and the zone purpose statement includes no language suggesting that the purpose statement functions as a mandatory approval criterion for conditional uses allowed in the zone. Buel-McIntire v. City of Yachats, 63 Or LUBA 452 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reject a city council's interpretation of a code provision allowing a property owner to site a recreational vehicle (RV) on the property for "temporary living purposes" to require that the RV be accessory to or in conjunction with a permanent dwelling on the property, where nothing in the applicable code provision expressly or impliedly requires a dwelling, and the city has expressly required, in other inapplicable code provisions, that an RV be an accessory use to or be in conjunction with a dwelling. Buel-McIntire v. City of Yachats, 63 Or LUBA 452 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. While a local government has latitude to identify applicable standards and criteria in its comprehensive plan and land use regulations, under ORS 227.173(1) the "standards and criteria" must already exist in the plan and ordinance, and the local government cannot manufacture standards and criteria to apply to approve or deny a permit application. Buel-McIntire v. City of Yachats, 63 Or LUBA 452 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer does not err in interpreting a code standard requiring historic design review for alterations to a building having exterior materials "specifically listed" in the city's historic resource inventory not to require that contributing exterior materials be specifically described as contributing. If fairly read the text and context of the building description in the inventory indicates that a particular exterior material contributes to the building's significance, then historic design review is required to alter that exterior material. Carlton Development LLC v. City of Portland, 62 Or LUBA 157 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a city's historic resource inventory lists a building's "wood sash windows" in the "Description" paragraph rather than in the "Significance" paragraph does not mean that the windows are not contributing features, where in context it is clear that the inventory uses the description paragraph to list all contributing and noncontributing building features, and the significance paragraph is simply a summary conclusion based on the features listed in the description paragraph. Carlton Development LLC v. City of Portland, 62 Or LUBA 157 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer does not err in concluding that "wood sash windows" are specifically listed features contributing to a building's historic significance, such that a historic design review permit is required to replace the windows with vinyl windows, where the city's inventory concludes that the building is a "contributing" resource based on the features listed in the building description, including the original wood sash windows. Carlton Development LLC v. City of Portland, 62 Or LUBA 157 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of the use category "retail and wholesale trade facilities" to include a travel plaza that sells fuel, convenience items and food to travelers, where the proposed use fits within the plain and ordinary meaning of the use category's broad terms, and nothing in the text or context narrows the scope of the use category. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An allegedly erroneous and overbroad code interpretation that all commercial uses allowed in any commercial zone are allowed under the use category "retail and wholesale trade facilities" in an airport overlay zone does not warrant reversal or remand, where the interpretative error, if any, does not undermine the governing body's principal interpretation that the proposed travel plaza is a "retail and wholesale trade facility." Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reverse under ORS 197.829(1) a governing body's interpretation that a Limited Use overlay zone is applied to limit uses in exception areas only when the applicant requests it, and that instead conditions of approval can be applied to limit uses, when (1) the Limited Use overlay zone is expressly intended for that purpose, (2) nothing in the code suggests an alternative mechanism to limit uses or authorizes attaching conditions of approval to limit uses in exception areas, and (3) under the county's interpretation and the criteria that govern designation of the overlay zone there are no circumstances under which the overlay zone could be applied. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local governing body interprets its zoning ordinance to conclude that either one of two provisions could apply to an application for a dwelling in a forest zone and that the applicant for the dwelling may choose to have the application evaluated under one or the other provision, LUBA will affirm that interpretation where that interpretation is not inconsistent with the text, context or purpose of the underlying provisions. Bardolf v. Yamhill County, 62 Or LUBA 321 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a county governing body's interpretation that an application to change the comprehensive plan map designation for property to Rural Use is not by itself a request for a right to develop more than one residence on the property and therefore need not be concurrently accompanied by a RU zone change application, when that interpretation is consistent with the express language of the provision. City of Jacksonville v. Jackson County, 62 Or LUBA 439 (2011).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The requirement that a dwelling sought to be replaced be a "building * * * which is occupied in whole or in part" does not include a requirement for continuous occupancy. Dalton v. Polk County, 61 Or LUBA 27 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a replacement dwelling approval standard requires that the dwelling sought to be replaced have been "lawfully constructed," if there is a final unappealed decision that removed a use restriction from a lawfully established dwelling, the fact that that decision may have been incorrect does not change the fact that dwelling was legally established and may be replaced. Dalton v. Polk County, 61 Or LUBA 27 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a proposed replacement dwelling is in a forest zone rather than an EFU-zone, case law regarding the interpretation of "intact" for purposes of establishing that a dwelling sought to be replaced has "intact exterior walls" is not binding on the local government. Dalton v. Polk County, 61 Or LUBA 27 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When deciding whether development is "small to moderate in scale" under one element of a comprehensive plan, a local government may consider language from another comprehensive plan element as context in determining that development of less than 100 acres is "small to moderate in scale." Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 61 Or LUBA 96 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When determining what constitutes "development activity" in a subarea identified in the comprehensive plan, where the subarea provides for water dependent development, and the local government included inwater structures in its calculation of development acreage, dredging within those waters must be considered "development activity" in the subarea. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 61 Or LUBA 96 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a local comprehensive plan provision that implements Goal 16 requires the local government to "protect" a resource, any development allowed is not consistent with the Goal 16 definition of "protect" unless there is at most a de minimis or insignificant impact on the resource that the provision requires to be protected. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 61 Or LUBA 96 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan provision that implements Goal 16 and requires the local government to "protect" wildlife habitat within an estuary may be satisfied through off-site mitigation within the Goal 16 definition of "protect" if such mitigation results in no net loss to the protected habitat within the estuary, even if there is an impact at the development site. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 61 Or LUBA 96 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When building height requirements are measured from the "ground surface" within five feet of an exterior wall, a local government does not misconstrue the applicable law by interpreting "ground surface" to include the finished ground surface that is altered and raised during construction. Concordia Neighborhood Association v. City of Portland, 61 Or LUBA 143 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A requirement that mining "not be allowed closer than one-quarter mile from any noise or dust sensitive use" is properly interpreted to impose a minimum setback, leaving the applicant to select the mining site so long as the site selected is at least one-quarter mile from any noise or dust sensitive use. Any attempt by the local government to interpret the standard to allow it unbridled discretion to enlarge the one-quarter-mile setback would likely run afoul of the ORS 215.416(8)(a) requirement that permit applications be approved or denied based on "standards." Hoffman v. Deschutes County, 61 Or LUBA 173 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance requires a mining permit applicant to demonstrate that a proposed mining operation can meet certain state standards and a state standard prohibits mining "without taking reasonable precautions to prevent particulate matter from becoming airborne," and a local government interprets that state standard to require that the applicant successfully prevent all particulate matter from becoming airborne, the local government erroneously interprets the state standard. The state standard only requires that the applicant take reasonable precautions; it does not require the elimination of all airborne particulate matter. Hoffman v. Deschutes County, 61 Or LUBA 173 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The hearings officer correctly interprets a code standard allowing modifications to a conditional use permit that result in "insignificant changes" in the physical appearance of development, use of the site, or impact on surrounding properties to be concerned with modifications that change the proposed development, not a modification to a deadline to complete the development as originally approved. Connecting Eugene v. City of Eugene, 61 Or LUBA 439 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The more deferential standard of review set out at ORS 197.829(1) applies to interpretations by local government governing bodies. The deferential standard of review set out at ORS 197.829(1) does not apply to interpretations by other local decision makers, such as hearings officers, and LUBA reviews such interpretations under ORS 197.835(9)(a)(D) to determine whether the hearings officer "[i]mproperly construed the applicable law." Waverly Landing Condo. Owners' Assoc. v. City of Portland, 61 Or LUBA 448 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although a local code provision that requires an application to be reviewed for "consistency" with a variety of code requirements may not involve the same analysis that would be necessary if the code provision required the application to "comply" with explicit and easily measurable setback or height requirements, a local government misconstrues the applicable law in finding that it may ignore the "consistency" review unless an application also seeks a variation. Hoskinson v. City of Corvallis, 60 Or LUBA 93 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation that a "common green" is a "full street" under a code provision that allows a reduction in density requirements where a "full street" is created is correct, where the code defines "common green" as a type of street, and does not include a definition for "full street." Meade v. City of Portland, 60 Or LUBA 265 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. Where the local government did not adopt a reviewable interpretation of its erosion control ordinance to explain why the local government believes the erosion control ordinance applies to applications for preliminary subdivision approval, and it appears that the text of the erosion control ordinance could plausibly be interpreted to apply or not to apply to such decisions, remand is appropriate for the local government to interpret the erosion control ordinance in the first instance. Montgomery v. City of Dunes City, 60 Or LUBA 274 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When the local code requires a finding that a new parcel be suited for the "intended or offered" use, and the code requires a partition applicant to identify the intended use, a local government's interpretation that a finding of suitability is required only when the partition applicant files a concurrent permit application seeking approval of a specific use is not consistent with the text and context of the partition code. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 60 Or LUBA 336 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a local code provision requires that a partition application demonstrate that "all required public service and facilities are available and adequate," the local government does not misinterpret that provision to apply only to services and facilities provided by third parties that serve more than one property, and not to apply to facilities provided on-site by the landowners to serve only the subject property. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 60 Or LUBA 336 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of its ordinance is not "inconsistent" with the language of the ordinance, within the meaning of ORS 197.829(1)(a), if the interpretation is plausible, given the interpretive principles that ordinarily apply to the construction of ordinances under the rules of PGE v. Bureau of Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 859 P2d 1143 (1993). Scovel v. City of Astoria, 60 Or LUBA 371 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In determining whether a local government's interpretation of local land use law is inconsistent with the "express language" of the local land use law, LUBA and the appellate courts apply the statutory construction principles in ORS 174.010, which preclude interpretations that insert or delete words. Scovel v. City of Astoria, 60 Or LUBA 371 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of its own land use laws to allow the planning commission complete discretion to grant an unlimited number of one-year permit approval extensions will not be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1), where the local government's interpretation adds language that is not present in the local land use law, and the interpretation defeats the purpose of the local land use law, which is to limit the life of a permit decision that is not acted on. Scovel v. City of Astoria, 60 Or LUBA 371 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Context includes previous versions of an ordinance. Where the previous comprehensive plan expressly permitted nonresource land to be designated Rural Residential, but subsequent plan amendments (1) eliminated that language and replaced it with language restricting the Rural Residential designation to lands subject to an exception to Goals 3 or 4, and (2) adopted a Rural Use designation limited to nonresource lands that do not require an exception, that context suggests that the county intended to restrict the Rural Residential designation to resource lands which require a goal exception, and exclusively employ the Rural Use designation for nonresource lands that do not require a goal exception. Rogue Advocates v. Jackson County, 60 Or LUBA 392 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county's Rural Residential plan designation implements OAR 660-004-0040, which applies exclusively to rural residential areas that are subject to Goal 3 or 4 exceptions, and expressly does not apply to nonresource lands not subject to those goals, it is reasonable to presume that the Rural Residential designation also applies exclusively to resource lands for which a Goal 3 or 4 exception is taken, and is not intended to apply to nonresource lands. Rogue Advocates v. Jackson County, 60 Or LUBA 392 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. As part of a text and context analysis, LUBA may consider any local legislative history in the record for purposes of understanding the intent in adopting the text and context being considered. Rogue Advocates v. Jackson County, 60 Or LUBA 392 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reverse a governing body's interpretation of an ambiguous plan provision, the text of which can be read to allow nonresource lands to be redesignated Rural Residential, where that interpretation is inconsistent with the text, context, purpose and underlying policy of the plan provision, and contrary to an administrative rule that the plan provision implements. Rogue Advocates v. Jackson County, 60 Or LUBA 392 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Because a comprehensive plan is made up of both text and maps, LUBA's deferential standard of review set out at ORS 197.829(1) applies to local government interpretations of plan maps as well as local government interpretations of plan text. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Curry County, 60 Or LUBA 415 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a composite map that is produced by enlarging a small scale comprehensive plan estuary map and applying it to a larger scale tax lot specific map has a fairly significant margin of error, it is plausible to interpret the small scale comprehensive plan estuary map to (1) include an entire small tax lot in a natural management unit, (2) exclude the entire small tax lot in a natural management unit or (3) place the small tax lot partially in a natural management unit and partially in a conservation management unit. In that circumstance, no further explanation is required for the local government's choice among the three plausible interpretations. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Curry County, 60 Or LUBA 415 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan generally describes the resources that were to be protected by designating a natural estuary management unit on a small scale comprehensive plan map in 1981, a petitioner fails to show the local government's failure to interpret the comprehensive plan to include a small tax lot in the natural management unit is inconsistent with the "purpose" or "underlying" policy of the plan, within the meaning of ORS 197.829(1)(b) and (c), where, under the local government's interpretation, the natural estuary management unit still includes all of the resources that the comprehensive plan identified as justifying the natural estuary management unit in 1981. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Curry County, 60 Or LUBA 415 (2010).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioners assign error to a local government construction of applicable local land use law, the question for LUBA is whether the local government's interpretation must be sustained under ORS 197.829(1), not whether petitioners' interpretation is sustainable or a better interpretation than the local government's interpretation. Siporen v. City of Medford, 59 Or LUBA 78 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will not affirm a local governing body's interpretation of a code provision prohibiting development from disturbing more than 5,000 square feet to exempt areas temporarily disturbed during construction where that interpretation is inconsistent with the text of the code provision and context provided by the defined term "development," and policies and purposes of the development code. Horsey v. City of West Linn, 59 Or LUBA 185 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where no new roads or intersections are proposed as part of a partition, a hearings officer errs in interpreting a comprehensive plan policy that requires development to be served by adequate roadway facilities to require a showing of compliance with local ordinance criteria and road design standards that apply only to new roads and intersections. Pelz v. Clackamas County, 59 Or LUBA 219 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of a code provision that a modification of a detailed development plan necessarily extends the effective period of an approval of that detailed development plan, where that interpretation is consistent with the text and purpose of the provision. Knapp v. City of Corvallis, 59 Or LUBA 285 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reverse a county governing body's code interpretation that a conditional use allowed in an Acreage Residential zone that generates any amount of dust leaving the property must be denied because it is not in harmony with the purpose of the zone to buffer urban uses from farm uses, where the zone allows a number of dust-generating uses as permitted and conditional uses in the zone, including farm use, and under the county's interpretation few if any of those uses could ever be approved in the zone. Davis v. Polk County, 58 Or LUBA 1 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city errs by approving a variance to subdivision standards under its general zoning variance criteria, where a separate city ordinance provides variance standards for subdivisions, and the city's decision offers no reviewable interpretation or explanation why the subdivision variance standards do not apply. Holbrook v. City of Rockaway Beach, 58 Or LUBA 179 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When the local code defines "building" as a "structure built for the support, shelter, or enclosure of persons, animals, chattel, or property of any kind," the local government does not exceed its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in finding that utility power poles are not buildings and thus not subject to building height restrictions. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 58 Or LUBA 190 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a local code establishes a hierarchical framework for terms that are not defined by the code, the local government must adhere to that framework, and not skip to the last source in the framework when a definition is provided by an earlier listed source. Using a lower hierarchy dictionary definition of "protect" that means to attempt to preserve a resource instead of a hierarchically superior OAR definition of "protect" that means to actually preserve a resource misinterprets the applicable law. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 58 Or LUBA 190 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government misinterprets the applicable law by finding that a liquefied natural gas facility is "small or moderate" in scale just because it encompasses less than 100 acres and needs less than 20 acres of fill. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 58 Or LUBA 190 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a code provision that authorizes uses in a zone that are similar to listed uses, to allow a proposed use that is similar to a listed use, even if the proposed use is specifically listed in another zone, where the governing body's interpretation gives independent effect to that code provision and is consistent with its text and context. Western Land & Cattle, Inc. v. Umatilla County, 58 Or LUBA 295 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county's code includes not one but two separate provisions authorizing uses that are not listed as permitted uses in that zone, or listed anywhere as a permitted use in any zone, if the use is "similar to" uses permitted in the zone, it is clear that the county is not concerned with maintaining bright lines between use categories, and the county does not err in approving a "truck stop" as a similar use to an "automobile service station," even though the applicable zone does not list truck stops as a permitted use while other zones in the county do. Western Land & Cattle, Inc. v. Umatilla County, 58 Or LUBA 295 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city governing body does not err in interpreting comprehensive plan policies that govern "development" to be inapplicable to a proposal to annex and extend sewer service to fully developed property. Link v. City of Florence, 58 Or LUBA 348 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a local governing body's interpretation of a code provision allowing development approval to be extended for two years if "conditions have not changed" to require denial of the requested extension only if the changed conditions would have resulted in denial of the original application, and that interpretation is consistent with the text and purpose of the code provision. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. City of Brookings, 58 Or LUBA 421 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county does not err in interpreting a comprehensive plan policy requiring that airports be compatible with surrounding uses to be satisfied by incorporated findings addressing conditional use permit standards that, the county found, ensure that the airport is compatible with surrounding uses. Johnson v. Marion County, 58 Or LUBA 459 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy that requires that development shall comply with "applicable" Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) standards to not require that the applicant demonstrate that a proposed personal use airport will comply with a DEQ noise program that DEQ has suspended. Johnson v. Marion County, 58 Or LUBA 459 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county does not err in concluding that the county's noise ordinance is not a conditional use approval standard for a personal use airport, where the noise ordinance is not part of the county's zoning regulations, the noise ordinance functions as a performance standard rather than an approval standard, and the noise ordinance includes an exclusion for noises generated by approved conditional uses. Johnson v. Marion County, 58 Or LUBA 459 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of conditional use criteria in its code as containing a categorical exemption for certain public utility facilities is not inconsistent with other applicable conditional use criteria or the provisions of the relevant zoning overlay district and is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Paddock v. City of Lafayette, 58 Or LUBA 498 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Absent code language to the contrary, a county does not err in finding that regulations governing a particular zoning district apply only to land located within that district, and not to uses proposed on land adjacent to the district. Crockett v. Curry County, 58 Or LUBA 520 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a code provision requiring that a proposed use that is "inconsistent" with the transportation plan must be processed as a plan amendment, to require only that the county determine whether the proposed use is in conflict with any transportation plan policy, and not to require that the county find that the proposed use is specifically authorized by the transportation plan. Crockett v. Curry County, 58 Or LUBA 520 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When an approval criterion requires a partition map to show "other features affecting development," a local government does not misinterpret the applicable law by requiring an applicant to show areas designated as less and least suitable by the comprehensive plan. "Other features affecting development" can encompass physical features themselves as well as comprehensive plan designations based on those features. Sperber v. Coos County, 58 Or LUBA 570 (2009).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a code provision allowing second-floor residential use of a commercial building if "accessory to an active commercial use," to permit residential use by persons who are not owners or employees of the commercial use, where the code defines an accessory use as one that is "incidental and subordinate," rather than related to or associated with. VanSpeybroeck v. Tillamook County, 56 Or LUBA 184 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the relevant code provisions impose smaller building size limits on outright permitted commercial uses than conditionally permitted commercial uses, LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that a 4,353-square-foot structure housing both outright permitted and conditionally permitted commercial uses is not subject to the 4,000-square-foot limit on outright permitted commercial uses. VanSpeybroeck v. Tillamook County, 56 Or LUBA 184 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county does not err in interpreting a planned development standard requiring that at least 50 percent of the development be open space "retained for common use by owners and residents of the development" to refer to both commonly owned open space and privately owned open space. Saddle Butte Residents' Association v. Douglas County, 56 Or LUBA 269 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government interpretation that construes a local code requirement for open space that requires either "open space" or "outdoor recreation area" in a manner that requires both open space and outdoor recreation area is not entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1). Bridge Street Partners v. City of Lafayette, 56 Or LUBA 387 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city is not required to interpret traditional variance language ("practical difficulty or unnecessary hardship") in accordance with the traditional strict meaning of that language, particularly when that language is not used as part of the city's variance code but instead was borrowed from the variance context to be used as a test for expanding nonconforming uses. Azore Enterprises, LLC v. City of Hillsboro, 56 Or LUBA 422 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that a code provision requiring that private wells be shown to meet certain bacteriological quality standards does not also require a showing of sufficient quantity, where the code provision does not mention water quantity and other code standards appear to govern water quantity. Gardener v. Marion County, 56 Or LUBA 583 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a local code allows exceptions when there is a "demonstrable difficulty" in meeting the applicable approval standard, a finding that meeting the approval standard would produce little benefit, even if true, does not establish that there is a "demonstrable difficulty" in meeting the standard. Bullock v. City of Ashland, 56 Or LUBA 677 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of the meaning of various street classifications that are defined in its comprehensive plan is not inconsistent with the express language of the plan provision. Lufkin v. City of Salem, 56 Or LUBA 719 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The county's interpretation of a provision of its local code that allows the county to waive appeal fees for certain neighborhood groups is not inconsistent with the express provisions of its local code or other applicable ordinances under ORS 197.829(1). Ratzlaff v. Polk County, 56 Or LUBA 740 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation that allowing family and social guests to stay in two recreational vehicles parked on a lot adjoining the property owner's dwelling does not constitute a "recreational vehicle park" as that term is defined in the code, because it is not open to the "general public." Fessler v. City of Fossil, 55 Or LUBA 1 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council's interpretation of a planned unit development standard authorizing septic tanks for individual lots where it is "impractical" to connect the development to the city sewer system, to govern only circumstances requiring permanent septic tank installations, not temporary septic tanks to be used until the city system is upgraded, followed by mandatory connection to the city system. Coquille Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Coquille, 55 Or LUBA 155 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council interpretation of the code term "access" to include a driveway is not inconsistent with the text, context, purpose or policy of that term. Brodersen v. City of Ashland, 55 Or LUBA 350 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of a code provision providing minimum performance standards for "streets" to include unsignalized intersections. Vista Construction LLC v. City of Grants Pass, 55 Or LUBA 590 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Petitioner fails to demonstrate that the city erred in evaluating the performance of an intersection by measuring delays associated with each directional approach rather than the entire intersection, particularly when petitioner's own expert used the same method to evaluate intersection performance. Vista Construction LLC v. City of Grants Pass, 55 Or LUBA 590 (2008).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Absent a local regulation that requires otherwise, it is permissible to locate an accessory parking lot on land that is zoned differently than the land on which the primary use the parking lot serves is located. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Gresham, 54 Or LUBA 16 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government misconstrues its code when it finds that an ambiguity in the exhibits to an ordinance creates an inconsistency between the ordinance and the official zoning map. Brown v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 281 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer's interpretation of the phrase "mechanical means" as applying to technology using light emitting diodes in electronic signs is correct. Lamar Advertising Company v. City of Eugene, 54 Or LUBA 295 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA's standard of review of county counsel's interpretation of a local zoning code provision is whether that interpretation is correct. Love v. Klamath County, 54 Or LUBA 410 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that the use category of "truck sales, service, storage and maintenance" includes dispensing of fuel to trucks, notwithstanding that the code includes a different use category of "truck stop" that expressly permits dispensing fuel, where other context indicates that the county intended truck "service" to include dispensing fuel. Western Express v. Umatilla County, 54 Or LUBA 571 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code includes specific conditional use standards for a particular use category that is a permitted use in some zones and a conditional use in other zones, LUBA will affirm the local government's interpretation that the conditional use standards do not apply to that use if it is proposed in a zone where it is a permitted use. Western Express v. Umatilla County, 54 Or LUBA 571 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reject a local government's interpretation of an ordinance recital stating that "[a]t such time as a development agreement is executed" the comprehensive plan "will be amended" to provide an exception to access spacing standards described in the ordinance to mean that the access spacing exception applies to proposed development notwithstanding the absence of an executed development agreement. Western Express v. Umatilla County, 54 Or LUBA 571 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government is not bound by ORS 215.427 to interpret a local code provision in the manner that it has been interpreted in prior quasi-judicial proceedings on a different application. Greenhalgh v. Columbia County, 54 Or LUBA 626 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will not defer to a local government's interpretation of the phrase "necessary for and accessory to" forest management as meaning "convenient and efficient" to forest management, where such an interpretation is contrary to the plain meaning of the word "necessary," the express language of the provision at issue, and other language in the provision. Greenhalgh v. Columbia County, 54 Or LUBA 626 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Interpretations of a local code provision offered for the first time in a response brief at LUBA are not interpretations made by the local government. Munkhoff v. City of Cascade Locks, 54 Or LUBA 660 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a code provision defining the study area for an aggregate mine, to exclude haul roads used to transport finished aggregate material off-site, is consistent with the text of the code provision and is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Rickreall Community Water Assoc. v. Polk County, 53 Or LUBA 76 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation that the pre-existing use or structure on a property does not have to be currently lawful for redevelopment of the property to qualify as remodeling or a change of use, rather than new development, is not reversible under the deferential standard of review under Church v. Grant County, 187 Or App 518, 69 P3d 759 (2003), and ORS 197.829(1). Oregon Transfer Company v. City of Milwaukie, 53 Or LUBA 119 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In determining whether a proposed park and ride lot will result in an increase in parking demand, a local government does not err in comparing the parking demand created by the prior theatre use of the property, which was discontinued six years earlier and the proposed demand will be created by the proposed park and ride lot. In many cases involving remodeling of existing development or a change in use there will be intervals of days, months, or years between uses where no use or associated parking is occurring on the property. Oregon Transfer Company v. City of Milwaukie, 53 Or LUBA 119 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation that its community service overlay (CSO) zoning designation functions as a conditional use rather than a traditional overlay zone is sustainable under Church v. Grant County, 187 Or App 518, 69 P3d 759 (2003), and ORS 197.829(1). Therefore, because the CSO zone overlay can only be applied to approve a specific use, and unlike other city overlay zones, the CSO zone does not require a zoning map amendment, the CSO designation does not trigger the obligation to address the transportation planning rule. Oregon Transfer Company v. City of Milwaukie, 53 Or LUBA 119 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Even though the text and context of an ordinance give little indication of the city council's intent in adopting the ordinance, when there is an undisputed claim that the ordinance was adopted to clarify that the proposed development qualifies as an "assisted residential facility," the city council does not misconstrue the law in concluding that the proposed development qualifies as an "assisted residential facility." Toler v. City of Cave Junction, 53 Or LUBA 158 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation of code variance and off-street parking standards, to the effect that a potential off-street parking site that would otherwise satisfy the code off-street parking standard need not be considered, because it would require patrons of a proposed restaurant to cross a four-lane highway with no crosswalks or pedestrian facilities. Grant v. City of Depoe Bay, 53 Or LUBA 214 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a city council interpretation that a "self-created hardship" exists for purpose of obtaining a variance to a street access standard, where the applicant has taken actions in the past that are inconsistent with the expectation of obtaining future access, by consolidating the subject property with an adjoining lot that already has access. Krishchenko v. City of Canby, 53 Or LUBA 232 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer had authority to modify a prior permit's condition of approval requiring a perimeter fence, notwithstanding a code provision that prohibits a modification that is a "substitute for an appeal," where the requested modification is to approve a different fence location following a court order two years after the permit decision, and thus the modification could not have been the subject of an appeal. Chackel Family Trust v. City of Bend, 53 Or LUBA 385 (2007).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer's interpretation of a code standard requiring that proposed grading not cause erosion to any greater extent than would occur in the "absence of development" to mean in the "absence of proposed development," not prior development activities that predated the grading permit application, is reasonable and will be affirmed. Angius v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 222 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation of a code provision requiring that the applicant submit a letter from the service provider, to require only that the letter be submitted, not that it be free of error, where nothing in the text or context suggests that the county is supposed to second-guess the service provider's assessment. Angius v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 222 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zoning ordinance limits residential development on "weak foundation soils," but does not define that term, the city's interpretation of that term to include soils that the National Resource Conservation Service rates as having "severe" limitations but not to include soils rated as having "moderate" or "slight" limitations is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Jebousek v. City of Newport, 52 Or LUBA 435 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation of a plan provision allowing plan amendments when "necessary to correct an identified error in application of the plan," to include not only instances where the plan was erroneous when first implemented, but also instances where circumstances have changed over time. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Lane County, 52 Or LUBA 471 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's authority to interpret the scope and meaning of land use regulations adopted to implement statewide planning goals and administrative rules is constrained by ORS 197.829(1)(d), which requires LUBA to reverse an interpretation of a local regulation contrary to the goal, statute or rule it implements, notwithstanding the acknowledged status of that regulation. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 139 Or App 39, 911 P2d 250 (1996), LUBA may apply ORS 197.829(1)(d) to review a local government's interpretation of an acknowledged code provision that implements a statewide planning goal, statute or rule only if the code provision is ambiguous. If the code provision is subject to more than one reasonable interpretation, one of which is consistent with the goal, statute or rule implemented, the local government cannot choose an interpretation that is inconsistent with the goal, statute or rule implemented. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county's zoning code, like the Goal 4 rule, categorizes certain less intensive uses as outright permitted uses and similar but more intensive or permanent uses as conditional uses allowable on forest lands, an interpretation that the more intensive use is allowed outright as an accessory use to forest operations free of restrictions imposed on the less-intensive use is inconsistent with the structure of the code. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Determining whether a "permanent logging equipment repair and storage" structure that is a listed conditional use under the Goal 4 rule but is not provided for at all under the county's forest zone is allowed as an outright permitted "accessory" use to forest operations requires interpretation of the text and context of the zoning code. Accordingly, LUBA's review of that interpretation is governed by ORS 197.829(1)(d) rather than the principle described in Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 139 Or App 39, 911 P2d 250 (1996). Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a base commercial zone does not provide for residential uses does not mean that an overlay zone that allows residential uses is necessarily inconsistent with the base zone. Absent some textual or contextual basis to conclude otherwise, LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that the overlay zone may authorize additional uses not authorized in the base zone. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The purpose statement to a land use regulation is both context for interpreting that regulation as well as an explicit statement of its purpose. LUBA will reverse a governing body's interpretation of the regulation to allow residential uses that are prohibited by and therefore inconsistent with the purpose statement. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the purpose of an overlay zone is to allow non-recreational uses only when they are related to or support recreational uses, under ORS 197.829(1)(b) LUBA will reverse a governing body's interpretation that the zone allows unrestricted non-recreational uses regardless of whether those uses are related to or support recreational uses. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's code interpretation that harmonizes and gives effect to two conflicting provisions, where the only other interpretation proffered would nullify an entire code chapter. Concerned Homeowners v. City of Creswell, 52 Or LUBA 620 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer does not err in interpreting a code provision that allows the "preparation of land for cultivation" that is a "customarily accepted agricultural activity" without a permit in agricultural zones to require the landowner to demonstrate that a proposal to cover an existing landfill with 100,000 cubic yards of soil not only involves "preparation of land for cultivation" but is also a "customarily accepted agricultural activity." Ehler v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 663 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a refinement plan specifies that applicable plan policies are "guidance for decision-making," as long as the decision maker actually considers applicable plan policies and explains the basis for its choice to give one policy greater weight than another, where different policies compete or point to different results, LUBA will not disturb that choice on review. Bothman v. City of Eugene, Or LUBA 701 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a city council interpretation of a code provision allowing flag lots where a "public street cannot be provided" to allow flag lots where code-compliant public streets cannot be provided. Because a non-compliant public street would almost always be theoretically possible, any other interpretation would essentially prohibit flag lots. Cutsforth v. City of Albany, 51 OR LUBA 56 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city does not err in interpreting a code provision requiring that a subdivision plat provide access "that will allow its development in accordance" with the code to not require that the applicant provide additional access to a parcel that is already developed consistent with applicable zoning. The code does not require the applicant to provide access to allow for potential redevelopment of developed parcels. Cutsforth v. City of Albany, 51 OR LUBA 56 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city annexation ordinance must be reviewed by Metro under its code to determine if the annexation is consistent "with other applicable criteria * * * under state and local law," Metro does not exceed its interpretive discretion by interpreting that requirement to allow it to determine if the city's annexation ordinance is inconsistent with two Oregon Supreme Court decisions concerning annexation. City of Damascus v. Metro, 51 Or LUBA 210 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the code defines "amphitheater" to include "fixed, permanent or temporary seating," a phrase that clearly refers to physical objects such as chairs or benches, a hearings officer errs in interpreting "temporary seating" to include bare ground on which people may sit or spread a blanket. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation that tents are temporary "structures" for purposes of applying fire safety siting standards to a campground, where the code defines "structure" broadly in a manner that is not limited to permanent structures, and the code clearly subjects campgrounds to fire safety siting standards. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation of a code provision requiring calculation of groundwater availability based on a study area including the "average size of lots and parcels within one-quarter mile" of the subject property to include the entirety of all lots or parcels that are at least partially within one-quarter mile of the property. A hearing officer's refusal to interpret the code to require that the study area be limited to just those portions of lots or parcels within a one-quarter-mile radius is not erroneous, where the county staff manual for more detailed groundwater studies requires consideration of the entirety of lots or parcels that are bisected by a one-quarter-mile radius, and it is reasonably clear that both types of studies consider the same area. Upright v. Marion County, 51 Or LUBA 415 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the purpose of a groundwater study area is to accurately assess the risk to groundwater from residential development, an interpretation that more accurately represents the existing and potential residential development conditions in the area is more consistent with the purpose and underlying policy of the study than a contrary but textually plausible interpretation that considers undevelopable portions of lots as being developable and hence overstates potential development pressures. Upright v. Marion County, 51 Or LUBA 415 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A standard requiring a finding that the uses allowed by the proposed zoning "can be served through the orderly extension of key urban facilities and services" does not require evaluation of all theoretically possible uses allowed in the new zone. A city does not err in interpreting such a standard as being satisfied by evidence that uses likely to be developed under the new zone, given the property's size and other constraints, can be served by key urban facilities and services. Bothman v. City of Eugene, 51 Or LUBA 426 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city does not err in assuming that two developed lots that are part of a five-lot tract will not be redeveloped when rezoned, for purposes of a rezoning standard requiring that uses allowed in the proposed zoning can be served by urban services, including transportation facilities, where the applicant does not propose redevelopment and the code requires a similar evaluation when property is redeveloped. Bothman v. City of Eugene, 51 Or LUBA 426 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government has adopted a generally applicable procedure under which it corrects violations of a variety of local laws by filing actions in circuit court, a local government decision that an existing use of property does not constitute a violation of its zoning ordinance that would justify filing a circuit court action under that procedure is not a land use decision. Wells v. Yamhill County, 51 Or LUBA 659 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government correctly interprets its zoning code only to allow local appeals of decisions that will constitute land use decisions when they become final. Wells v. Yamhill County, 51 Or LUBA 659 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government misconstrues its local code when it interprets the word "ownerships" to have different meanings in different parts of the code. Brown v. Lane County, 51 Or LUBA 689 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where it is possible to interpret a development code provision to require consideration of more facilities and services than a similar comprehensive plan policy and to require that those facilities and services be already available at the time of annexation, but a local government implicitly interprets the development code policy simply to implement the comprehensive plan policy and to be coextensive with the plan policy, LUBA will defer to that interpretation where there are other development code provisions that support that limited interpretation. Friends of Bull Mountain v. City of Tigard, 51 Or LUBA 759 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code standard allowing an increased or reduced setback for cellular towers based on considerations such as topography, etc., that increase or reduce off-site impacts need not be interpreted to include an implicit "no net increase" in off-site impacts standard. Tollefson v. Jackson County, 51 Or LUBA 790 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer errs in interpreting a code standard that allows a reduced setback for cellular towers based on listed considerations that increase or reduce off-site impacts, to allow a reduced setback as long as the applicant has minimized off-site impacts "to the extent possible" given the dimensional constraints of the property, where considerations such as the shape of the property and whether the applicant has minimized off-site impacts to the extent possible are not among the permissible considerations. Tollefson v. Jackson County, 51 Or LUBA 790 (2006).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that retaining walls that prevent erosion of a bluff on a public park are accessory to park uses, notwithstanding that the walls also serve to protect adjoining private property. Moreland v. City of Depoe Bay, 50 Or LUBA 44 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a code provision prohibiting removal of "riparian vegetation" plausibly could be interpreted either to apply throughout the zone or only within a defined "zone of riparian vegetation," LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that the code provision applies only within the zone of riparian vegetation. Moreland v. City of Depoe Bay, 50 Or LUBA 44 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county inventoried big game habitat, identified conflicting uses, analyzed the ESEE consequences, and identified the subject property as a 3B site (allow the uses which conflict with the resource site fully), the county governing body's interpretation that its code exempts 3B sites from further ESEE analysis is entitled to deference. Kemp v. Union County, 50 Or LUBA 61 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. County's interpretation that use of the past tense in plan language that development in a particular residential area "was limited to the creation of long, narrow lots adjacent to the roads" indicates that the plan provision does not constitute a mandatory approval criterion for the challenged partition is entitled to deference. Kemp v. Union County, 50 Or LUBA 61 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local ordinance that prevents reconsideration within a year of a denied application "following the close of the public hearing" does not prevent reconsideration of a resubmitted site plan application that was part of a prior application that was denied following a public hearing, when the public hearing only considered a plan and zone change combined with the site plan application rather than the site plan application itself. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Oregon City, 50 Or LUBA 87 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A new application that eliminates a previously proposed plan and zone change on adjacent parcels but retains essentially the same site plan application is not the "same or substantially similar" as the prior application for purposes of a local ordinance that precludes reconsideration of such applications within a year after denial of the first application. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Oregon City, 50 Or LUBA 87 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When an ordinance requires "windows or transparencies" and the local government denies an application for providing windows that are not transparent, the local government's interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the ordinance. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Oregon City, 50 Or LUBA 87 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. County interpretation that ordinance requiring a 25-foot access easement cannot be satisfied by two physically separated 20-foot easements is not inconsistent with the language, purpose, or policy of the ordinance, even if petitioner's suggested interpretation might also be consistent with the ordinance. Blossom Properties, LLC v. Marion County, 50 Or LUBA 269 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government interpretation that an elevated walkway that extends over an estuary zoned Water is not located in the Water zone, where the walkway is attached to a dock that is in a Marine Commercial zone. Crowley v. City of Bandon, 50 Or LUBA 389 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a code provision prohibiting application of urban residential zones outside urban growth boundaries is outdated may be a compelling argument for amending the code provision, but it is not a sufficient reason for the local government to ignore it. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Coos County, 50 Or LUBA 444 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation allowing residential units within a "recreational planned unit development," notwithstanding that "residential uses" are prohibited in the underlying zone, where the zone nonetheless allows a recreational planned unit development, and the code definition of that term includes residential units as a core component. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Coos County, 49 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code standard requiring that the local government apply the more restrictive standard when two or more conflicting standards apply does not govern circumstances where it is unclear which of two standards applies. In such circumstances, the local government must interpret its code to determine which of the standards governs the proposed use. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Coos County, 49 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where both possible interpretations of a code density standard equally conflict with other code provisions, the choice of which interpretation to adopt is up to the local government. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Coos County, 49 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An interpretation made by county counsel in a stipulated dismissal in a circuit court mandamus proceeding is not entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1). Flying J. Inc. v. Marion County, 49 Or LUBA 28 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the text of an ordinance clearly demonstrates an intent not to rezone a particular area, but an attached map shows the area as rezoned, the text controls over the map. Flying J. Inc. v. Marion County, 49 Or LUBA 28 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code requires that the zoning map be amended to an "appropriate designation" of the city when an area is annexed, and the city adopts county zoning for the annexed area but does not explain how county zoning satisfies the code requirement, remand is appropriate for the city to adopt findings or an interpretation demonstrating that the county zoning is consistent with the code requirement. Hammons v. City of Happy Valley, 49 Or LUBA 38 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret a planned unit development regulation requiring protection of "public safety" on sites with natural hazards "through clustering of development" on that portion of the site suitable for development as not requiring consideration of off-site impacts of proposed development. Dinges v. City of Oregon City, 49 Or LUBA 376 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county errs in interpreting a rezoning code provision requiring that "[o]ther lands in the county" are unavailable or not as well-suited as the subject property to limit the inquiry to lands outside UGBs, where nothing in the text or context so limits the inquiry, and context directs the county to locate uses allowed under the proposed zone within UGBs. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 49 Or LUBA 529 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code criterion requires that a nonfarm dwelling be situated on a portion of a lot or parcel that is "generally unsuitable for the production of farm crops and livestock or merchantable tree species," and the code then spells out the considerations for determining whether a portion of a lot or parcel is "unsuitable for farm use," the term "farm use" is not properly read to require evaluation of the suitability for farm uses other than the production of farm crops and livestock or merchantable tree species. Griffin v. Jackson County, 48 Or LUBA 1 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where code language limiting "gross square footage" is ambiguous and, based on text and context, could plausibly limit either "footprint" or "gross floor area," a governing body's choice between two equally plausible meanings is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) and Church v. Grant County, 187 Or App 518, 524, 69 P3d 759 (2003). Bemis v. City of Ashland, 48 Or LUBA 42 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city correctly construes a policy that conditions connection to or extension of city water and sewer service upon annexation or consent to annexation not to prohibit the city from requiring consents to annexation in other circumstances. Roads End Sanitary District v. City of Lincoln City, 48 Or LUBA 126 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will decline to interpret a local provision in the first instance under ORS 197.829(2), where the provision is subject to several potential interpretations, some of which, if adopted, would require reversing the decision. In such circumstances, remand is appropriate to allow the governing body to interpret the provision in the first instance. Moreland v. City of Depoe Bay, 48 Or LUBA 136 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where it is not clear from the comprehensive plan map whether the plan designation governing the subject property is a base or an overlay plan designation, LUBA will affirm a governing body's interpretation that the plan designation is an overlay designation, where the comprehensive plan text does not list or describe the designation as a base plan designation. Staus v. City of Corvallis, 48 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation of its own legislation that the ocean front setback line be measured from the edge of adjacent "enclosed living areas" rather than attached decks and patios is inconsistent with the express language of the local ordinance, where that ordinance measures the setback from the edge of adjacent "structures" and "structures" is defined to include decks and patios. Tonges v. City of Manzanita, 48 Or LUBA 296 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. Because OAR 660-006-0025(4)(t) does not require that "existing buildings" that are to be used for hardship dwelling must be connected to the same septic system that serves the existing dwelling, it would not be inconsistent with OAR 660-006-0025(4)(t) to interpret an ambiguous zoning ordinance provision for hardship dwellings in exclusive farm use zones not to impose that requirement either. Burton v. Polk County, 48 Or LUBA 440 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Given the significant regulatory distinctions between "single family dwellings" and "tourist rental cabins" allowed in a rural zone, a county may approve proposed cabins that will be owner-occupied part of the year under the densities allowed for "tourist rental cabins" only if their use for something other than "tourist rental cabins" is de minimis. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 466 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Owner-occupancy for 120 days per year is not a de minimis use of a dwelling, consistent with the status of dwellings as "tourist rental cabins." Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 466 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will reject an argument that a code limitation on "buildable area" regulates only the interior, habitable space of a dwelling, where the local government has previously interpreted the code provision to regulate uninhabited structures such as garages or sheds, and the context and legislative history of the provision indicates that it is intended to limit the area of a lot or parcel covered by structures, not the area of interior or habitable space. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 466 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An interpretation that some decks but not others are regulated under a code provision limiting the "building area" of a lot or parcel is inconsistent with the text and purpose of the provision, where the relevant terms do not distinguish between types of decks and the apparent purpose of the provision is to limit the area of a lot or parcel covered by structures. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 466 (2005).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation that it has authority to modify a condition of preliminary subdivision plat approval under a code standard allowing "minor changes" to an unrecorded subdivision plat is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Cove at Brookings Homeowners Assoc. v. City of Brookings, 47 Or LUBA 1 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's alleged misinterpretation of a code provision does not provide a basis for reversal or remand, where the only significance petitioner attaches to the misinterpretation relates to an issue that was not raised below and is therefore beyond LUBA's review. Comrie v. City of Pendleton, 47 Or LUBA 38 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. A governing body's interpretations that (1) the transportation system plan (TSP) is part of the city's comprehensive plan, (2) projects described in the TSP supersede transportation projects described in the comprehensive plan, and (3) extension of a different street than contemplated in the TSP is consistent with TSP language intended to allow the city flexibility in choosing which street to extend, are not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Comrie v. City of Pendleton, 47 Or LUBA 38 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a finding is ambiguous and could be read to misinterpret a code provision, but read in context it is reasonably clear that the local government did not intend the erroneous interpretation petitioner ascribes to it, and in fact intended an interpretation consistent with the code provision, petitioner's arguments based on that ambiguous finding do not provide a basis for reversal or remand. Wynn v. Polk County, 47 Or LUBA 73 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer errs in determining that an internal logging road is not a "road" because of its poor condition and infrequent use, where the code definition of "road" does not assign significance to the road's condition or frequency of use. McAlister v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 125 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a hearings officer misinterprets the code term "road," but does not address either the applicant's proposed interpretation that a logging track can be a "road" or a contrary planning staff interpretation that only platted rights-of-way or legally described easements are "roads," LUBA will remand the decision to the hearings officer to reconsider what constitutes a "road." McAlister v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 125 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government may not interpret a local code provision that requires connection to "an existing city standard paved street" to be satisfied by a security deposit in lieu of an improved street. Doob v. City of Grants Pass, 47 Or LUBA 152 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government has the discretion to interpret a local code provision requiring private streets to provide for pedestrian needs in a "safe and functional manner" to not require sidewalks on private streets serving four or fewer units, in context with another code provision that requires sidewalks on private streets only if the streets serve more than four units. Doob v. City of Grants Pass, 47 Or LUBA 152 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a conditional use approval criterion requires a finding that the proposed conditional use will have minimal adverse impacts "compared to the impact of development that is permitted outright," a county decision that interprets that criterion to be met by a proposed commercial recreational park, because an otherwise identical publicly owned recreational park could be approved as a use permitted outright, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Gumtow-Farrior v. Crook County, 47 Or LUBA 186 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Findings that rely on code drainage requirements to avoid impacts on adjacent farming are adequate to demonstrate compliance with a code standard requiring no significant impact on farming, where the only issue raised regarding impacts on adjacent farming involved drainage. Nelson v. Curry County, 47 Or LUBA 196 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a design review criterion requiring that the "bulk and scale" of a proposed retail supercenter be "compatible" with surrounding buildings as necessitating a comparison of the size of the proposed buildings and surrounding buildings—and not just visual compatibility—is consistent with the text of the criterion and not reversible under ORS 197.829(1)(a). Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Hood River County, 47 Or LUBA 256 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. There is no intrinsic reason why a regulatory concern to ensure compatibility of size between proposed and existing development must be expressed as zoning standards rather than as site design review standards. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Hood River County, 47 Or LUBA 256 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation that a code definition of "Construction Sales and Services," allowing retail sale of "materials used in construction, maintenance and repair/remodel of buildings," does not limit the materials sold to any particular subset of "repair/remodel" materials is not inconsistent with the express language, purpose or underlying policy of the code definition. Heilman v. City of Corvallis, 47 Or LUBA 305 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city's new acknowledged comprehensive plan includes a provision stating that existing development zones continue to apply until the new code is acknowledged, it is within the city's discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret that plan provision to resolve any conflicts between the old zoning code and new comprehensive plan designations. Heilman v. City of Corvallis, 47 Or LUBA 305 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a city's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret comprehensive plan language setting out considerations for locating commercial development in the city as being planning directives to the city to be used in determining the appropriate plan designation or zone, and not as approval standards that an applicant for commercial development permitted outright in a particular zone must satisfy. Heilman v. City of Corvallis, 47 Or LUBA 305 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local code provision that requires legislative amendments to be consistent with the comprehensive plan and land use ordinances is not properly interpreted to require repeal and re-adoption of the entire comprehensive plan in order to amend a portion of the plan. The local government's interpretation that amendments must be consistent with unamended provisions of the plan and land use ordinances does not misconstrue the applicable law. Stevens v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 381 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city does not exceed its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in interpreting a code provision requiring that development not be contrary to applicable comprehensive plan policies to allow a balancing of competing comprehensive plan policies. Chin v. City of Corvallis, 46 Or LUBA 1 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a city sign code adopts the Oregon Motorist Information Act (OMIA) by reference may indicate that the city intends to allow at least some OMIA-permitted signs within the city, but does not necessarily indicate that all OMIA-permitted signs are allowed in the city, much less that OMIA-permitted signs are allowed outright without further city regulation. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a sign code provision stating that state sign permit holders need not seek separate city approval can be read either to (1) allow such signs outright within the city, or (2) allow such signs only if otherwise permitted by the sign code, and either interpretation is consistent with the text and context of the provision, the city's choice between interpretations is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1)(a). Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the purpose of a sign code includes preventing sign clutter and minimizing distractions for motorists, a sign code interpretation that results in smaller and lower signs along public highways than would result under other interpretations is consistent with the code's purpose and underlying policy, for purposes of ORS 197.829(1)(b) and (c). Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A broad and poorly defined sign code prohibition on "billboards" does not necessarily require inquiry into the content of signs or allow content-based distinctions where, as interpreted by the city, the code allows or prohibits all signs, including "billboards," based on specific standards that do not require inquiry into the content of proposed signs. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A poorly defined code prohibition on "billboards" is not unconstitutionally overbroad when, read in context, it is subject to a narrowing construction that clarifies the meaning of "billboard" and the precise scope of the prohibition. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A poorly defined code prohibition on "billboards" is not unconstitutionally vague where, as interpreted and read in context, the sign code provides definite and objective standards governing all signs, including billboards, and does not grant the city "unbridled discretion" to approve or deny proposed signs. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The governing body is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in interpreting a standard to be a post-approval performance standard on industrial uses rather than an approval criterion, where the standard is within a section entitled "performance standards" and prescribes impermissible levels of pollution rather than approval criteria. Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city is entitled to appropriate deference to its interpretations of regional land use legislation under ORS 197.829(1), notwithstanding that the city is one of several enacting bodies that adopted the regional land use legislation. Jaqua v. City of Springfield, 46 Or LUBA 134 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A planning commission incorrectly interprets a code standard prohibiting "construction" on slopes greater than 30 percent to limit only construction of a building within a building envelope, and not to include a steep driveway and retaining walls, where the plain meaning of "construction" is not limited to buildings, the text and context do not suggest that the governing body intended to limit its regulatory effect to building envelopes, and the proposed driveway and retaining walls implicate the same regulatory concerns regarding erosion and visual scarring underlying the code standard as would construction of a building. McCulloh v. City of Jacksonville, 46 Or LUBA 267 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county's interpretation that cabins used more than half the year for residential use by owner-occupants and less than half the year for rental to tourists qualify as "tourist rental cabins" is inconsistent with the code definition of that term, where rental to tourists is the key definitional element, the code applies important regulatory distinctions to tourist uses and residential uses, and nothing in the text or context of the code suggests that more than de minimis residential use of the cabins is compatible with their status as tourist rental cabins. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 46 Or LUBA 509 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a code definition of "tourist rental cabins" can plausibly be read to allow separate ownership of buildings and land on property, and legislative history in the record supports that interpretation, a county's interpretation that the cabins and underlying land need not be in common ownership is consistent with that definition and not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 46 Or LUBA 509 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where two interpretations of a local code are both less than compelling and neither interpretation is inconsistent with the apparent purpose or policy of the code, LUBA will defer to the interpretation adopted by the local government. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Hillsboro, 46 Or LUBA 680 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. City interpretation that hospitals can be auxiliary uses in residential zones is not inconsistent with the express language of the comprehensive plan when hospitals are already allowed as auxiliary uses in some residential zones under acknowledged local code. Friends of Eugene v. City of Eugene, 46 Or LUBA 721 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. City interpretation that hospitals can be permitted in industrial zones is not inconsistent with the express language of the comprehensive plan when the comprehensive plan does not preclude non-industrial uses that are compatible with industrial uses. Friends of Eugene v. City of Eugene, 46 Or LUBA 721 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government could permissibly interpret local code to allow variance to minimum lot size standard where general variance standards were met. Walker v. Josephine County, 46 Or LUBA 777 (2004).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the text of a local code standard does not require that an applicant establish that a proposed subdivision will not adversely affect nearby wells and does not require a finding that the applicant will be able to secure state agency approvals for its water supply, the local government is within its interpretative discretion under OAR 197.829(1) in interpreting that standard not to impose those obligations. Paddock v. Yamhill County, 45 Or LUBA 39 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government does not misconstrue a local ordinance requiring permanent legal access to a parcel by relying on easements entered into by prior landowners with government agencies providing reciprocal rights for access. Sisters Forest Planning Comm. v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 145 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy that prohibits "highway commercial development" south of a particular intersection as prohibiting "any commercial development" south of the intersection rather than "Highway Commercial" zoning or commercial development with direct access to the highway is not reversibly wrong. Barton v. City of Lebanon, 45 Or LUBA 214 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a city council interpretation of its zoning ordinance as not requiring a separate zoning amendment application where city zoning is applied to property inside the city's urban growth boundary as part of the annexation process. Barton v. City of Lebanon, 45 Or LUBA 214 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In considering whether a local government interpretation of a local provision is consistent with the express language of the provision under ORS 197.829(1), LUBA may consider the context of the provision. Bruce Packing Company v. City of Silverton, 45 Or LUBA 334 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An interpretation of a local code provision to allow an offsite parking lot in conjunction with a commercial use in a residential zone where such commercial uses are prohibited is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1), where the context of the code provision includes regulations governing the residential zone that expressly allow a public parking area for use by persons patronizing a particular building or establishment. Bruce Packing Company v. City of Silverton, 45 Or LUBA 334 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer does not err in evaluating the adequacy of the "approach" to an intersection, rather than individual turning movements in the intersection, where the applicable code provisions do not specify a particular method for evaluating intersection adequacy, and that method is consistent with the highway capacity manual and county highways standards cited by the code provisions. Noble v. Clackamas County, 45 Or LUBA 366 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government interpretation of its own code that allows home occupations to exhibit some characteristics of a business does not violate ORS 197.829(1) when the local government code expressly allows for up to five employees, on-premises signage, and on-premises parking. Stewart v. Coos County, 45 Or LUBA 525 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city does not err in concluding that a parking lot on a portion of the Oregon State University Campus that is three quarters of a mile from proposed development is in "close proximity" to proposed development and on the same or abutting "site," where the city finds the campus to be a single integrated "site" and three quarters of a mile a reasonable distance for college students to walk, given adequate pedestrian facilities and shuttle services. Bagnell v. City of Corvallis, 44 Or LUBA 284 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Given the similarity between a code provision requiring preservation of "existing landscape features and amenities" "to the greatest extent possible," and another code provision requiring preservation of "significant trees and vegetation" "to the maximum extent practicable," a city does not err in interpreting one provision to be satisfied by findings addressing the other. Bagnell v. City of Corvallis, 44 Or LUBA 284 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. No reasonable person could interpret a plan policy stating that the county plans to participate with other counties in a regional aggregate needs analysis as imposing a requirement that an applicant seeking to amend the county's aggregate inventory must establish a "public need" for aggregate. Hegele v. Crook County, 44 Or LUBA 357 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although LUBA might be required to defer to a city interpretation of a subdivision criterion that requires that a proposed subdivision provide access to adjoining property as not applying where an adjoining property currently has access that it may lose in the future through condemnation, LUBA will not assume the criterion does not apply where the challenged decision does not adopt that interpretation. McFall v. City of Sherwood, 44 Or LUBA 493 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although a code provision that prohibits approval of a conditional use permit in circumstances where there are existing violations of county ordinances does not dictate that a condition of approval be included with a conditional use permit that the conditional use permit may be revoked if those violations recur in the future, it is within the county's discretion to interpret that code provision to permit it to impose such a condition. Cookman v. Marion County, 44 Or LUBA 630 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although a city might reasonably interpret a rezoning criterion that requires application of the "best suited" zone to require that an applicant demonstrate a need for the uses that would be allowed under the requested zoning, a city might also reasonably reject that interpretation and find that current land use needs are not relevant to its decision regarding which zoning district is "best suited." Dimone v. City of Hillsboro, 44 Or LUBA 698 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county errs in interpreting a one dwelling per 40 acres density standard intended to protect Goal 5 wildlife habitat to be satisfied if the average dwelling density over a 1.2-million-acre area of the county does not exceed the standard, where the county's interpretation gives the standard no regulatory effect until over 28,000 dwellings are built in the area, and is inconsistent with the purpose of the standard to protect wildlife habitat. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 44 Or LUBA 745 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local standard imposing a one-dwelling-per-40-acres density limitation on Goal 5-protected wildlife habitat must be construed in a way that is consistent with its purpose and context to allow no more than one dwelling per 40 acres on the subject property. As applied to a destination resort, such a standard may effectively prohibit a resort that proposes 200 single-family residential lots in a 500-acre area. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 44 Or LUBA 745 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in interpreting a code provision requiring a showing of "public need" for "rezonings," to apply only to map amendments to a base zone, and not to map amendments to an overlay zone. Doty v. Jackson County, 43 Or LUBA 34 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code provision that allows certain uses in a zone "provided that the use promotes the purpose of the zone" is, on its face, a mandatory approval criterion. A city interpretation that fails to give any meaning to that language, and effectively reads it out of the code, is inconsistent with the express language of the code and is not entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1). Crowley v. City of Bandon, 43 Or LUBA 79 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret a standard requiring that "other lands in the county" be unavailable for the uses allowed under proposed rezoning to be satisfied by examining lands in the vicinity of the subject property, and not to require consideration of all lands throughout the entire county. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 43 Or LUBA 97 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in interpreting the term "bankful stage" to be equivalent to "top of the bank," where the pertinent code language was modeled on a Metro ordinance that expressly equates the two terms. Such an interpretation is not rendered erroneous simply because the unusual topographic facts of a case may make locating the "bankful stage" at the "top of the bank" mean that a portion of the subject property is undevelopable. Starks Landing, Inc. v. City of Rivergrove, 43 Or LUBA 237 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a code provision that fails to provide any independent meaning to a key term and that effectively eliminates that term from any function in the code is not entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1). Church v. Grant County, 43 Or LUBA 291 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 197.175 requires that land use decisions comply with the applicable comprehensive plan. However, whether a particular plan provision is an approval criterion for a particular quasi-judicial land division application depends on the language of the comprehensive plan and its implementing regulations, with appropriate deference to any explicit or implicit interpretations of the comprehensive plan and implementing regulations by the local government. Donivan v. City of La Grande, 43 Or LUBA 477 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's decision to affirm a lower body's decision is sufficient to impute any local code interpretation of the lower body to the governing body, with or without a hearing before the governing body, unless the governing body expressly rejects or changes that interpretation. Baker v. Lane County, 43 Or LUBA 493 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A reasonable person could interpret the term "lodge" in the phrase "lodges and grange halls" to refer to more than a fraternal meeting place, and to include a commercial lodging facility like an inn or resort hotel, where both senses are within the dictionary definition of the term, and other code provisions the county separately provide for a "fraternal meeting place" and a "hotel, motel or lodge." Baker v. Lane County, 43 Or LUBA 493 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local variance provision imposes on the applicant the burden of establishing the nonexistence of alternatives to the variance, the local government errs in interpreting its code to impose on opponents the burden of establishing the existence, costs and consequences of alternatives. Stahl v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 518 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where LUBA cannot tell if the local government simply weighed conflicting evidence, or instead impermissibly rejected the opponent's evidence for failure to satisfy a nonexistent burden of proof, the local government's error in explicitly shifting the burden of proof to the opponents is not harmless. Stahl v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 518 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code interpretation to the effect that the county need not consider lesser height variances if the proposed additional height poses no conflicts with views is inconsistent with code language that (1) requires consideration of lesser or no variances, and (2) contains no exception for variances that do not pose conflicts with views. Stahl v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 518 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code interpretation that limits the scope of alternative height variances that must be considered to those that provide the applicant with the same 35-foot height limitation allowed in a different regulatory zone is an impermissible amendment in the guise of interpretation, where the interpretation changes a rigorous alternatives analysis into a pro forma exercise and eliminates a regulatory distinction between zoning districts. Stahl v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 518 (2003).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city's plan and zoning ordinance provisions provide that development within 500 feet of transit stops "should" be pedestrian-oriented and encourage "pedestrian and transit-friendly development criteria," the city's interpretation that those provisions do not require that only pedestrian-oriented uses may be permitted within 500 feet of a transit stop or promoted within the applicable zoning district is entitled to deference. Barman v. City of Cornelius, 42 Or LUBA 548 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city is within its discretion to interpret a zoning ordinance that encourages uses that complement and support existing uses and discourages "auto dependent commercial uses" as not constituting an outright prohibition of auto-dependent uses such as an automobile service station, as long as the automobile service station will be clustered near existing complementary uses such as a shopping center and a fast-food restaurant. Barman v. City of Cornelius, 42 Or LUBA 548 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city is within its discretion to interpret a comprehensive plan provision requiring establishment of a master plan prior to allowing development within a commercial district as being satisfied by the design review process where the city code defines "master plan" as a plan created through the land use review process governing design review and conditional use review, and the city does not have an independent process for establishing a master plan. Barman v. City of Cornelius, 42 Or LUBA 548 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county considers dust impacts from mining that may have an impact on neighboring residential uses, those dust impacts may form a basis for denial only if the impacts violate applicable Department of Environmental Quality air quality standards. Morse Bros., Inc. v. Linn County, 42 Or LUBA 484 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a regional transportation plan (RTP) specifies that a proposed interchange will include "five lane overpasses," and the record includes a planning program manager's interpretation that a short sixth exit lane does not make the interchange inconsistent with the RTP, it is not error for the decision maker to rely on that interpretation and reasoning in determining that the interchange is consistent with the five-lane overpass described in the RTP. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation of a "public interest" standard for street vacations, that the standard is met when the record shows that potential future development in the area will not require the retention of the street, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1). Confederated Tribes v. City of Coos Bay, 42 Or LUBA 385 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The deferential standard of appellate review of interpretations of local land use laws that is required under ORS 197.829(1) does not apply where the decision maker is not the local legislative body and does not apply to local government interpretations of state land use law. Jordan v. Columbia County, 42 Or LUBA 341 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code provision limiting dwelling density to "one dwelling per 38 acres" in a big game overlay zone is meaningless unless given a frame of reference. An interpretation that the required frame of reference is the entire 640-acre section in which the proposed dwelling is located, rather than the area of the section subject to the overlay zone, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1)(a) to (c), where related code provisions refer to the dwelling density in relation to the "section," and the county's interpretation is not inconsistent with the purpose of and policy underlying the overlay zone. Matiaco v. Columbia County, 42 Or LUBA 277 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code provision limiting the planning director's interpretative powers, and prohibiting interpretations of the zoning ordinance that find a use not listed in the zone is "substantially similar" to a listed use, does not necessarily limit the board of commissioners' interpretative powers. To the extent it may, the commissioners' interpretation that the proposed use is a listed use is consistent with the code prohibition. Yeager v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 72 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation that a commercial horse facility that teaches children how to ride and care for horses is a "recreational facility" allowed as a conditional use in a rural residential zone is within its interpretative discretion under ORS 197.829(1). That portions of the proposed use can also be described as a commercial "riding arena," which is expressly allowed in a different zone, does not mean that the proposed use cannot be a "recreational facility," or that the county adopted a de facto code amendment altering the uses allowed in the rural residential zone. Yeager v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 72 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A board of county commissioners does not exceed its interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1) when it interprets a comprehensive plan policy to "[e]nsure that traffic attracted to commercial development will not adversely affect neighborhoods" as being limited to examining traffic impacts on "residential" neighborhoods and to the "local" streets that serve such residential neighborhoods. Swyter v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 30 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A board of county commissioners acts within its interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1) where it interprets a comprehensive plan policy to "[e]nhance energy conservation and transportation system efficiency by locating opportunities for housing near work and shopping areas" to be met in the "obverse" situation where a proposal would "locate work and shopping areas near housing." Swyter v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 30 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in interpreting code language providing for "certain limited commercial" uses within a Residential Transitional zone as not limiting commercial uses to those listed in the Limited Commercial zone. Chilla v. City of North Bend, 41 Or LUBA 539 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city does not exceed its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) in interpreting code language providing for "rezoning" of property for limited commercial purposes "on a conditional use basis" to allow limited commercial uses on the property pursuant to a conditional use permit, without amending the zoning map to apply a commercial zone to the property. Chilla v. City of North Bend, 41 Or LUBA 539 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A proposed communication tower may be subject to code provisions governing "transmission and receiving towers," even though it is county-owned and thus also arguably falls within a broad category of "municipal uses" allowed in the zone. Where a regulatory scheme lists as permitted uses in a zone both a general category of uses and a specific category of uses, with different sets of requirements, and the proposed use fits within the specific category, the specific category and its requirements apply exclusively. Luedtke v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 493

(2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where county road standards that apply when new lots are created by major partition or subdivision do not by their terms apply where lot lines are adjusted, the board of county commissioners is nevertheless within its interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), where it interprets separate code requirements for lot line adjustments as requiring that those county road standards be applied when providing access to lots for which lot lines have been adjusted. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 41 Or LUBA 476 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a city governing body's discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret a code provision requiring that the transportation system be capable of safely supporting the proposed use, considering eight factors including "level of service," as not requiring that affected intersections maintain an acceptable level of service at all times. Friends of Collins View v. City of Portland, 41 Or LUBA 261 (2002).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan provision that directs that a city should work with a county to ensure that certain lands are planned for residential development does not require the city to zone those lands exclusively for residential development. Dimone v. City of Hillsboro, 41 Or LUBA 167 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Plan policies that were clearly adopted to implement Goal 17 are not rendered inapplicable to a decision to approve fill in a coastal shoreland simply because the city codified those policies under the part of the comprehensive plan that is nominally devoted to Goal 16. Willhoft v. City of Gold Beach, 41 Or LUBA 130 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioners' interpretational challenge of a city's finding that proposed development complies with code provisions implementing Goal 5 is, in essence, an argument that the city's code provisions are insufficient to implement Goal 5, LUBA will reject the challenge as an impermissible collateral attack on the city's acknowledged Goal 5 regulations. Crowley v. City of Bandon, 41 Or LUBA 87 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The terms and not the title of a code provision setting forth certain exceptions to prohibited activities in riparian areas control the scope of the exceptions in that provision. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's interpretation to that effect where the text and context of the provision indicate that the provision applies more broadly than its title suggests. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 53 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm as reasonable and correct a hearings officer's interpretation of code provisions requiring that a proposed recycling facility be served by an adequate transportation system, to allow the facility notwithstanding some impacts on nearby failing intersections, so long as imposed conditions are sufficient to ensure that those impacts are de minimis. K.B. Recycling, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 29 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of two provisions granting broad rights to use and develop lawfully created substandard lots is not sustainable under ORS 197.829(1), where the governing body draws an implication from the second provision and uses that implication to prohibit what the first code provision expressly allows, in a manner that effectively eliminates the first provision. Church v. Grant County, 40 Or LUBA 522 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city code provision requires that a "proposal" to adjust development standards be reviewed for compliance with specific criteria, it is reasonable for the city to determine that the scope of the "proposal" is the adjustment proposed by the applicant and therefore that an application for a setback adjustment for a building facade does not require review of the building design as a whole. Lee v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 498 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city code requirement that multiple requests for adjustments must cumulatively comply with the overall purpose of the zone does not require the city to consider potential future adjustment requests that are not before it. The city's interpretation that limiting its consideration and approval to the adjustment request before it does not preclude the possibility of future adjustments is reasonable and correct. Lee v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 498 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's interpretation that a state highway is not subject to city road design standards for streets providing access to a proposed subdivision is not clearly wrong, and is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Costanzo v. City of Grants Pass, 40 Or LUBA 471 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city does not err in determining that a code provision requiring that roads providing access to a proposed subdivision be paved to city standards is satisfied by a state highway that is paved to state standards. Costanzo v. City of Grants Pass, 40 Or LUBA 471 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a city council's discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret its code to limit design review of historic landmarks to historic design review criteria, where the code's design review provisions state that historic landmarks are exempt from design review and are instead subject to historic design review. Pearl District Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 436 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An apparent conflict between a city's current code, as interpreted, and a set of uncodified ordinances and guidelines that reflect superseded code language provides no basis to reverse the city's code interpretation. Pearl District Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 436 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a city council's discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret a code provision that requires the "transportation structure" to be "adequate," as not requiring separate quantified empirical analysis with respect to separate components of the transportation system, such as parking. Under that interpretation, it is permissible for the city to rely on the ready availability of transit, bicycle and pedestrian transportation, and evidence that development allowed under rezoning can satisfy previously established off-street parking requirements, to conclude that the transportation structure is adequate with respect to parking. Wakelin v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 401 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a local provision is adequate for review where its findings articulate or demonstrate the governing body's understanding of the provision to a degree sufficient to resolve the issues raised in the petition for review. Huff v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 264 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a governing body's discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret a comprehensive plan provision that allows commercial rezoning of "areas" having "an historical commitment to commercial uses," neither to require a demonstration of exclusive commercial use, nor to require that the "area" under consideration include an entire parcel. Huff v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 264 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Statutory nonconforming use provisions at ORS 215.130 do not prohibit rezoning land to allow uses that would not be allowed to continue as nonconforming uses. Nor is the statute violated or undermined by the county's consideration of a history of illegal commercial uses, in applying a plan provision that allows land that has an "historical commitment" to commercial uses to be rezoned for commercial use. Huff v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 264 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a zone change criterion requires that an area have a "historical commitment to commercial uses" and the county governing body finds that criterion is met by a property that has been vacant for 11 years but was used for commercial purposes for the prior 65 years, LUBA will defer to that interpretation under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Swyter v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 166 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city governing body expressly interprets a traditional "extraordinary circumstances" variance criterion as being met in a circumstance where it traditionally would not be satisfied, that interpretation must nevertheless be affirmed under ORS 197.829(1) if the city governing body's interpretation is not inconsistent with the "express language" or the "purpose" of the variance criterion. Reagan v. City of Oregon City, 39 Or LUBA 672 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a variance criterion provides that a variance is not available where the applicant's circumstances "merely constitute a monetary hardship or inconvenience," the applicant's inability to create a second lot out of an existing lot without the variance would appear to "merely constitute a monetary hardship or inconvenience," absent a contrary interpretation of that criterion by the local governing body. Reagan v. City of Oregon City, 39 Or LUBA 672 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although a city's interpretation that it may balance applicable comprehensive plan provisions is entitled to deference, remand is necessary when the city fails to consider and balance against other plan provisions applicable provisions in the city's transportation system plan. ODOT v. City of Klamath Falls, 39 Or LUBA 641 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When petitioner disagrees with a local government's interpretation of its own ordinance but fails to acknowledge or challenge that interpretation, petitioner establishes no basis for determining that the interpretation is clearly wrong. McNern v. City of Corvallis, 39 Or LUBA 591 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city code requires that a lot line adjustment may be approved only if adequate public facilities are available to serve the resulting parcels and the proposal is compatible with the comprehensive plan, the city errs in interpreting the code to limit its consideration to the lot line adjustment itself and not the uses proposed on the adjusted lots. Mountain West Investment v. City of Silverton, 39 Or LUBA 507 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a city council's discretion to interpret its zoning ordinance to allow commercial-sized greenhouses as outright permitted uses in a residential zone and to allow a related home occupation florist business as a conditional use without considering the impacts that may be associated with the greenhouses. Latta v. City of Joseph, 39 Or LUBA 318 (2001).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to a city's decision requiring replat of a previously approved subdivision to modify private easements where it is clear that the city's decision was based solely on the provisions of ORS chapter 92, notwithstanding that the city subsequently applied local code provisions to determine the relevant approval criteria for the replat and how those approval criteria should be applied. Haber v. City of Gates, 39 Or LUBA 137 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 92.185 provides a specific requirement that public easements within a recorded plat must be reconfigured by replatting. However, the express reference in that statute to "public easements" and the absence of an express reference to "private easements" make it clear that reconfiguration of private easements within an existing subdivision plat does not require a replat under ORS 92.185. Haber v. City of Gates, 39 Or LUBA 137 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where an approval criterion contains two subsections with similar or overlapping requirements, but the local government's findings do not address one of the subsections or interpret the criterion to the effect that findings of compliance with both subsections are unnecessary, remand is appropriate to address the omitted subsection or adopt an interpretation justifying the omission. Chilla v. City of North Bend, 39 Or LUBA 121 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government fails to interpret a local provision, and the purpose of the provision is unclear and subject to numerous interpretations, LUBA will decline to interpret the provision in the first instance and remand the decision to the local government. OTCNA v. City of Cornelius, 39 Or LUBA 62 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a city council interpretation of a comprehensive plan annexation policy that requires the city to "insure that there is a five year supply of vacant land within the city," as imposing a general anti-sprawl requirement rather than an absolute requirement that the city include no more than a five-year supply of vacant land. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city council interprets that a zone change criterion requiring a public need for the use proposed is met where there is a statistical probability that the segment of the population the proposed facility will serve will need the facility, LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The existence of vacant land that is planned and zoned for multi-family residential use does not mean there can be no need for additional multi-family residential designated land, where there is a specific multi-family residential need identified and none of the land that is already designated for multi-family residential use is suitable for that specific need. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city may demonstrate compliance with a zoning change criterion that requires that the identified public need will be best served by rezoning the proposed site by showing that other sites, individually or as a group, are inferior to the proposed site. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a local ordinance creates an exemption from additional approval criteria for uses permitted in the underlying zone, and the ordinance distinguishes between permitted uses and uses subject to administrative review, it is incorrect to determine that wineries, which are uses subject to administrative review, are permitted uses in the exclusive farm use zone, and thus not subject to the additional approval criteria. Roth v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 894 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation that "commercial timberland properties" only refers to properties "operated by or for the benefit of commercial timber operations," and does not include property operated by individuals, is clearly wrong. Fessler v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 844 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the purpose and underlying policy of a local ordinance is, in part, to require consideration of the traffic impacts on transportation facilities caused by rezoning property in order to ensure that any impacts are consistent with the minimum level of service for such facilities, the city's interpretation that a street accommodating up to 250 average daily trips from adjacent property does not "serve" that property is contrary to the purpose and underlying policy of the ordinance and is clearly wrong. Anderson v. City of Medford, 38 Or LUBA 792 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Even if the decision makers were persuaded to reverse their initial decision by a change in city policy that occurred after the subject application was filed, a local government may reinterpret the meaning of indisputably applicable approval standards. Anderson v. City of Medford, 38 Or LUBA 792 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a variance criterion provides that the use of a structure may not change as a result of a variance, an interpretation that a variance may nevertheless be granted to convert a storage shed to a medical hardship dwelling is clearly wrong. Puma v. Linn County, 38 Or LUBA 762 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A finding that one alternative for providing sewer service to a proposed medical hardship dwelling has been approved by county health officials is inadequate to demonstrate compliance with an approval standard that requires that another alternative be used unless that alternative "is not feasible." Puma v. Linn County, 38 Or LUBA 762 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city code provision allows conditional use approval of a building that exceeds a mandatory height limit provided the increased building height "does not adversely affect the ocean * * * views" of neighboring structures, the city's interpretation of that provision to mean that the part of the building exceeding the height limit may not block any part of a neighboring property's view of ocean water from any perspective within the neighboring property is not clearly wrong. Rivera v. City of Bandon, 38 Or LUBA 736 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of code "compatibility" and "livability" standards as requiring that it consider whether a permit proposal for a 24-hour adult video business would result in increased potential for criminal activity and in increased vacancies in nearby offices is not impermissibly vague and is within the city's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Even under the deferential standard of review required by Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), city interpretation of a variance criterion that requires that a variance be "necessary to prevent a hardship to the applicant" as being met because without the variance the applicant will be unable to construct as much storage as he would like to have on the property at his preferred location on the lot is erroneous. Roberts v. City of Gearhart, 38 Or LUBA 407 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county code provision specifically requires findings documenting whether there is a need for additional land for a particular purpose and whether the timing is appropriate to rezone land for that purpose, but the county interprets the code provision to not require documentation of the need and timing elements in a particular instance, that interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the provision and "clearly wrong." Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 357 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The "exceptional or extraordinary circumstances" standard is a demanding traditional variance standard. Under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), a city may be able to interpret that standard in a more lenient manner than the courts and LUBA have, but the city must articulate that interpretation in its decision. Bates v. City of Cascade Locks, 38 Or LUBA 349 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county is within its discretion under ORS 197.829(1) to interpret a code requirement regulating "new residential dwelling units" to apply to a proposal to convert an existing house no longer lawfully used as a dwelling into a watchman/caretaker dwelling. Bogan v. Coos County, 38 Or LUBA 166 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county's interpretation that certain comprehensive plan policies are inapplicable to a land use approval because those policies have been implemented by the county code is inadequate for review, where the county fails to identify any code provision that implements those policies or explain why those policies are among the plan policies implemented by the code rather than those that apply to specific land use approvals. Spiro v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 133 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Plan policies requiring that all proposed rural area development "shall be furnished" with an adequate water supply are stated in mandatory terms. A county's interpretation that such policies are aspirational is inconsistent with the terms of those policies and clearly wrong. Spiro v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 133 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county urbanization policy that was adopted to implement Goal 14 must be interpreted consistently with Goal 14's prohibition against approval of urban uses on rural land. Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 37 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A conditional use permit standard for aggregate extraction requiring that the applicant submit "sufficient information to allow the county to set standards" regarding the location, quality and quantity of resource available allows but does not obligate the county to set such standards in approving the permit. A local government's interpretation to that effect is consistent with the express language of the standard and is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1) or Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Jorgensen v. Union County, 37 Or LUBA 738 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The standard of review LUBA must apply to a governing body's interpretation of its own land use regulations is not affected by whether the decision in which the interpretation appears is quasi-judicial or legislative. The deferential standard of review required by Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 719 (1992), is based on the governing body's presumed better understanding of the intended meaning of its legislation and the governing body's political accountability for that legislation. Homebuilders Association v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 707 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm as reasonable and correct a determination of a city historic review commission that historic review development standards directed at modifications or impacts on historic property do not apply to new development on vacant lots within an historic district. Goose Hollow Foothills League v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 631 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An historic review development standard requiring that development in an historic district be compatible with adjacent historic structures and the rest of the historic district does not require findings of compatibility with specific nonadjacent historic structures or require that the decision maker ensure compatibility with structures in the immediate neighborhood as distinct from the district as a whole. Goose Hollow Foothills League v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 631 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. To the extent an historic review development standard requiring that the "historic character" of a property be "retained" applies to new development on a vacant lot within an historic district, a historic review commission does not err in failing to require that new development emulate the design, height, scale and features of the historic structure that previously existed on the lot. Goose Hollow Foothills League v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 631 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy that requires that scenic views be "promoted and protected" is met where a zoning ordinance amendment will not significantly affect scenic views is not "clearly wrong," and must be affirmed by LUBA under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Marine Street LLC v. City of Astoria, 37 Or LUBA 587 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county's legislation is ambiguous with respect to whether the county "recognizes" a neighborhood association for purposes of statutory notice and local appeal requirements, LUBA will remand to the county for interpretation in the first instance. McKy v. Josephine County, 37 Or LUBA 554 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government finds noncompliance with an approval criterion because an intersection outside the traffic study area is inadequate to serve the subject property, but it is not clear why the local government believes the intersection "serves" the property, LUBA will remand to allow the local government to provide a more adequate interpretation of the criterion. Ontrack, Inc. v. City of Medford, 37 Or LUBA 472 (2000).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county exceeds its interpretational discretion under ORS 197.829 and Clark v. Jackson County where it interprets an ordinance prohibiting home occupations that require alteration of a structure in a manner that changes the character of the structure under the Uniform Building Code, to allow such home occupations as long as the structure is altered to conform to the Uniform Building Code. Greer v. Josephine County, 37 Or LUBA 261 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 227.178(3) constrains a city's ability to change existing interpretations regarding the applicability of approval criteria during the course of proceedings on an application, but does not constrain a city's ability to reinterpret the meaning of indisputably applicable standards. Greer v. Josephine County, 37 Or LUBA 261 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county governing body's interpretation that a zoning ordinance requirement that "activities" specified in a farm management plan be implemented did not require that each and every task for which a cost estimate was provided in the farm management plan for each year be implemented is not "clearly wrong," and, therefore, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the issue of when local governments may be required to conform their plans and land use decision making to an amended regional framework plan is a question of statutory construction, Metro's possible reliance on an interpretation of its own legislation in establishing a compliance schedule under the statutes is entitled to no deference. Commercial Real Estate Economic Coalition v. Metro, 37 Or LUBA 171 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The scope of additional conflicts that may be considered under OAR 660-023-0180(4)(b)(F), is a question of state law and a county's interpretation of OAR 660-023-0180(4)(b)(F) is not entitled to the deferential standard of review required by ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Morse Bros., Inc. v. Columbia County, 37 Or LUBA 85 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county governing body does not exceed its interpretive discretion in interpreting a zoning ordinance provision that allows development of lots of record notwithstanding the lot's failure to meet lot area, width and depth requirements as not also excusing the zoning requirement that lots that are less than five acres in size be served by a public or community water system. Columbia Hills Development Co. v. Columbia County, 36 Or LUBA 691 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county governing body does not exceed its interpretive discretion in interpreting a zoning ordinance provision that delegates responsibility to the planning director to interpret the zoning ordinance as not preventing the governing body from interpreting the comprehensive plan in the first instance following an appeal of a planning director decision to the planning commission and the county governing body. Columbia Hills Development Co. v. Columbia County, 36 Or LUBA 691 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a Goal 4 committed exception imposes a zoning district with a five-acre minimum lot size and a lot of record provision that allows development of lots smaller than five acres but does not impose a specific residential density limit, the county governing body exceeds its interpretive discretion in interpreting the exception as imposing a 2.3-acre minimum residential density. Columbia Hills Development Co. v. Columbia County, 36 Or LUBA 691 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In the absence of a city's determination whether a comprehensive plan policy is a mandatory approval criterion, LUBA will exercise its interpretative discretion under ORS

197.829(2) to determine that the plan policy is a mandatory approval criterion, where the terms of the plan policy require the city to determine that essential public services "can be provided to a site" before granting development approval. That the plan policy specifies an exception to its requirements reinforces the conclusion that it is mandatory. Terra v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 582 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan policy requiring that "[e]xcavations and fills shall be limited to those minimal areas where alteration is necessary to accommodate allowed development" is couched in terms imposing certain requirements in development approvals, and is thus a mandatory approval criterion. Terra v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 582 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county acts within the discretion afforded by ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 515, 836 P2d 710 (1992), where the zoning ordinance requires a finding that utilities and services likely to be needed by the "anticipated uses" are available, the county limits allowed uses on the property to the applicant's proposed use, and the county interprets the term "anticipated uses" to consist solely of the proposed use. A reasonable person could construe the term "anticipated uses" to denote something less than the range of uses allowed in the zone. City of Newberg v. Yamhill County, 36 Or LUBA 473 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city's implicit interpretation that an adjoining public roadway provides access to a manufactured home park for purposes of the city code's minimum access roadway improvement standard, and that internal proposed roadways are not access roadways, is not clearly wrong. Wiley Mtn., Inc. v. City of Albany, 36 Or LUBA 449 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city commission is within its interpretative discretion under ORS 197.829 to determine that a requirement that planned unit development within a natural hazards zone be consistent with applicable comprehensive plan policies is satisfied by a demonstration of compliance with ordinance standards implementing those comprehensive plan policies. Salo v. City of Oregon City, 36 Or LUBA 415 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a plan policy, implementing the Transportation Planning Rule, requires that the parking spaces per capita ratio must be reduced by 10 percent but does not specify how the starting point for computing the reduction must be computed, a city council interpretation that the starting point computation may include approved but not yet constructed parking spaces is within the city's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829. Baughman v. City of Portland, 36 Or LUBA 353 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where an intergovernmental agreement governs until certain recommendations have been implemented, and also requires that those recommendations be implemented within a reasonable time, it is inconsistent with the terms of the agreement for a local government to unilaterally declare that the agreement no longer governs after four years, whether or not the recommendations have been implemented. City of Salem/Marion County v. City of Keizer, 36 Or LUBA 262 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county may adopt its own interpretation of "public need" as that term is used in its comprehensive plan, and that interpretation is not constrained by judicial interpretation of similar, but unrelated, statutory standards. Turrell v. Harney County, 36 Or LUBA 244 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm as not clearly wrong an interpretation that commercial uses not otherwise listed as allowed uses in a university district are allowed when they are uses "customarily associated" with universities and thus fall within the definition of a use expressly allowed in the district. Brome v. City of Corvallis, 36 Or LUBA 225 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within a city council's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829 to interpret local design guidelines granting the city authority to impose conditions or require changes to construction proposals to meet those design guidelines to also permit the city to deny an application that does not meet those guidelines. Barnard Perkins Corp. v. City of Rivergrove, 36 Or LUBA 218 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code does not dictate how rear and front lot lines are to be identified, a city council is within its interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829 in requiring that building orientation be considered. Barnard Perkins Corp. v. City of Rivergrove, 36 Or LUBA 218 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. An argument that an uninterpreted clause of a local land use regulation conflicts with the city's express interpretation of another clause of that regulation is more appropriately framed as an argument that the city's interpretation is inconsistent with the terms of the regulation, not that the city's interpretation is inadequate for review. McElroy v. City of Corvallis, 36 Or LUBA 185 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local provision allows the planning commission to "consider the redesign" of a development plan "in whole or in part" when the applicant petitions for modification of the development plan, a city council interpretation of that provision to allow the planning commission to address modifications beyond those requested by the applicant is not clearly wrong. McElroy v. City of Corvallis, 36 Or LUBA 185 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county's implicit interpretation of a local provision is inadequate for review where the county's unambiguous understanding of the meaning of the provision is not discernible in the manner in which it applies that provision. LUBA cannot review a putative interpretation of a local provision where, because of the brevity of the county's findings and the nonspecific terms of the local provision, it cannot determine which of several plausible interpretations the governing body might have intended. Eddings v. Columbia County, 36 Or LUBA 159 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city comprehensive plan provision requires a site-specific investigation of natural hazards "prior to development," the city is within the discretion afforded it by ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 504, 836 P2d 710 (1992), in interpreting that provision to apply at the stage where the city is evaluating a specific proposal for development such as a building permit. Jebousek v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 124 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Exercise of LUBA's authority under ORS 197.829(2) to interpret local land use law in the first instance is not appropriate where the relevant code provision prohibiting reduction of acreage available for farm use could refer to reduction (1) of acreage on adjacent lands or (2) of acreage on the subject property that is available for use in conjunction with farm uses on adjacent lands. Where both interpretations are plausible and it is disputed factually whether the relevant lands could be used in conjunction with adjacent lands, a remand to the county to render its interpretation in the first instance is appropriate. DLCD v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 88 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city council interprets a code standard that excuses a permit applicant from providing required parking where "special circumstances exist constituting a hardship" as being satisfied where the cost of providing the one additional parking site that is possible on the property will constitute an "economic hardship out of proportion to the gain of parking spaces," and petitioner does not specifically challenge the city council's findings, LUBA will affirm that interpretation unless it exceeds the city's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1). Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 68 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county code "stability" standard that does not implement the statutory nonfarm use "stability" standard is not subject to case law interpreting the statutory "stability" standard, but such a code "stability" standard necessarily connotes a temporal period and a scope of causative impact for analysis. However, a county's interpretation of the local "stability" standard as focusing on short-term effects and direct impacts rather than long-term and cumulative impacts is not clearly wrong and therefore must be affirmed by LUBA. Ray v. Douglas County, 36 Or LUBA 45 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A planning director's letter that does no more than repeat the planning commission's condition of approval and speculate as to how that condition might be applied is not, under local zoning code, an "action or ruling" that may be appealed to the planning commission. Schultz v. City of Forest Grove, 35 Or LUBA 712 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where provisions allowing enforcement of the city's ordinance only specifically authorize judicial remedies, the city's interpretation of the enforcement provisions as allowing the city to conduct quasi-judicial proceedings to determine nonconforming use status is inconsistent with the terms of that provision and not entitled to deference under Goose Hollow Foothills League v. City of Portland, 117 Or App 211, 843 P2d 992 (1992), or ORS 197.829(1). Dept. of Transportation v. City of Mosier, 35 Or LUBA 701 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to a county's interpretation of ORS 215.130, governing nonconforming uses, or ordinance provisions that implement the statute. Marquam Farms Corp. v. Multnomah County, 35 Or LUBA 392 (1999).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A governing body's interpretation of a local provision is within the discretion afforded by ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, where the local ordinance requires that development allowed under a conditional use permit be commenced within six months in order to become effective, and the governing body interprets the ordinance to mean that development has commenced when the applicant has complied with all conditions precedent and obtained all required permits. Heidgerken v. Marion County, 35 Or LUBA 313 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the zoning ordinance allows a variance from its standards when those standards create a hardship due to one or more defined conditions, a hearing officer errs in requiring the applicant to demonstrate hardship in addition to those stated in the defined conditions. Kelley v. Clackamas County, 35 Or LUBA 215 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of the terms "top of the nearest clearly defined bank" to mean the point where the angle of slope decreases rather than the top of the nearest ridge is within the range of plausible meanings denoted by the terms of that provision, and thus is not clearly wrong. Dodds v. City of West Linn, 35 Or LUBA 101 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of its zoning ordinance as requiring conditional use approval for a towing yard as an "other industrial use" will be sustained where towing yards are not listed as an outright permitted use and the zoning code does not allow uses that are similar to outright permitted uses as permitted uses. Williamson v. City of Arlington, 35 Or LUBA 90 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council interpretation of the term "flood" as being limited to the "base flood" or 100-year flood must be sustained by LUBA where the stated objectives and introductory language of the zoning code are consistent with the narrow interpretation. Visher v. City of Cannon Beach, 35 Or LUBA 74 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of a comprehensive plan requirement for "small lot" to be met by a lot size of 10,000 square feet is within the city council's interpretive discretion. Barnard Perkins Corp. v. City of Rivergrove, 34 Or LUBA 660 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county interpretation of a code provision that allows smaller lot sizes provided certain road improvements are in place as also allowing smaller lot sizes so long as the number of residences is restricted until road improvements are made is clearly wrong. DLCD v. Tillamook County, 34 Or LUBA 586 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government does not expressly interpret a code provision, but adopts findings that are sufficiently detailed to demonstrate that it interprets the provision to require evaluation of the subject property rather than surrounding properties, LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Rouse v. Tillamook County, 34 Or LUBA 530 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government's broad interpretation of the term "transportation terminal" as including "airports" and "airport related uses" where the interpretation is not inconsistent with the text, purpose or policy of the zoning ordinance. Northwest Aggregates Co. v. City of Scappoose, 34 Or LUBA 498 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local provision sets forth criteria in the disjunctive, but the sense and context of the provision compel application of each criterion, LUBA will affirm as reasonable and correct an interpretation by the local planning commission that the criteria must be satisfied seriatim rather than alternatively. Recovery House VI v. City of Eugene, 34 Or LUBA 486 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA cannot determine whether inadequate findings are "clearly supported" by the record under ORS 197.835(11)(b) where the local provision to which the findings are directed is subject to numerous interpretations and the decision does not contain an adequate interpretation of that local provision. LUBA will not both fashion an interpretation of a local provision and then review the record for evidence clearly supporting findings of compliance with that provision, as interpreted. Doob v. City of Grants Pass, 34 Or LUBA 480 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a necessary interpretation of a local ordinance is absent or inadequate, LUBA will decline to interpret the local provision in the first instance, pursuant to ORS 197.829(2), when multiple interpretations are possible, and neither the county nor the applicant files a response brief. Wodarczak v. Yamhill County, 34 Or LUBA 453 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a petitioner at LUBA challenges an interpretation that first appeared in the challenged decision, petitioner need not have raised an issue concerning that interpretation during the local proceedings. Tenly Properties Corp. v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 352 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Because a county's interpretation of its code to allow deferral of compliance with an approval criterion to a later stage with no opportunity for public hearing is contrary to ORS

197.763(2) and 215.416, LUBA owes that interpretation no deference under ORS 197.829(1). Tenly Properties Corp. v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 352 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code provision that imposes different standards depending on how many "functions" the street supports is ambiguous. A county interpretation that equates "function" with the number of units that use the street for "access" rather than the number of units that "border" the street is a plausible interpretation. Tenly Properties Corp. v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 352 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county adopts the comprehensive plan of a city pursuant to an intergovernmental agreement, LUBA will not defer to the county's interpretation of the city's plan. Trademark Construction, Inc. v. Marion County, 34 Or LUBA 202 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is not required to defer to an interpretation by a hearings officer. Thus, the proper standard of review is not whether the hearings officer's interpretation is contrary to the ordinance's express terms or policy, but rather whether that interpretation is reasonable and correct. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 34 Or LUBA 14 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government fails to adopt a needed interpretation of a land use ordinance, LUBA may interpret the ordinance on appeal. LUBA will do so where the facts are undisputed, a pure question of law is presented and the parties adequately address the interpretive issue in their briefs. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 34 Or LUBA 14 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government may change a prior interpretation that a plan provision is not an approval criterion and apply that plan provision as an approval criterion to a request for permit approval. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 34 Or LUBA 1 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 227.178(3) does not prevent a city from adopting an interpretation of a comprehensive plan that is different than the interpretation that was in effect on the date the permit application was submitted, and applying that new interpretation to the permit application. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 34 Or LUBA 1 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a local government interprets its ordinance so that it effectively interprets the meaning of the terms "standards and criteria" in ORS 227.178(3), LUBA is not required to give that interpretation any deference. The appropriate standard of review in that instance is whether the local government's interpretation is reasonable and correct insofar as it interprets or applies ORS 227.178(3). Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 34 Or LUBA 1 (1998).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. LUBA is required to defer to a local governing body's implied interpretation of a local ordinance as long as the implied interpretation is adequate for review under ORS 197.829(2). Bradbury v. City of Bandon, 33 Or LUBA 664 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the purpose of a local provision is unclear and subject to numerous interpretations, LUBA will decline to interpret the provision in the first instance. Bradbury v. City of Bandon, 33 Or LUBA 664 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where local code includes two different definitions of "campgrounds," a county decision approving a campground must address both definitions and determine whether one or both definitions apply and whether the proposed use complies with whatever definition applies. Donnelly v. Curry County, 33 Or LUBA 624 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A finding need not include an express interpretive statement about the meaning of a code standard as long as the local government's interpretation of the standard can be discerned from the way the standard is applied. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 33 Or LUBA 613 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county may regulate or define uses allowed under ORS 215.283(2) as long as it does not define those uses more expansively than permitted by state law. R/C Pilots Association v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 532 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county may interpret its local codification of nonfarm uses allowed in EFU zones more restrictively than state law requires. Such a more restrictive interpretation is not contrary to ORS 215.283(2)(d) and will be affirmed by LUBA where it is not so inconsistent with the zoning ordinance as to be clearly wrong. R/C Pilots Association v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 532 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That a parcel may be separately transferable under ORS 92.017 does not determine whether the parcel may be separately developed. Eagle Point Development v. City of Shady Cove, 33 Or LUBA 509 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a city's resolution of a conflict between the city's comprehensive plan text and its comprehensive plan map in favor of the plan text where that interpretation fulfills a plan policy and is as consistent with the language and intent of the plan as the alternative interpretation. Hough v. City of Redmond, 33 Or LUBA 483 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local ordinance allows a community center in an open space zone as a conditional use, the city's interpretation that a community center is a compatible use in that zone is not clearly wrong. Risher v. City of Portland, 33 Or LUBA 479 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where approval criteria include conformance with a transportation element of a local comprehensive plan that has both mandatory and aspirational standards, the local government's interpretation that the aspirational standards are not specific approval criteria is not clearly wrong. Risher v. City of Portland, 33 Or LUBA 479 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will not defer to city's interpretation that a city code requirement for "usable outdoor recreation space * * * for the shared or common use of all the residents" is satisfied by balconies or by private patios and decks, where the code requires that such balconies, patios and decks be "designed to provide privacy." Dodds v. City of West Linn, 33 Or LUBA 470 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA defers to a county's interpretation of "flag lot" as used in local code, even if that interpretation can only be inferred from its actions, where the county's implicit interpretation is not clearly wrong. Central Bethany Dev. Co. v. Washington County, 33 Or LUBA 463 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city interprets its code erosion control standards as imposing construction guidelines, not approval standards requiring feasibility findings, LUBA must defer to that interpretation unless it is clearly wrong. Arnett v. City of Lake Oswego, 33 Or LUBA 384 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A code interpretation by a hearings officer is instructive and may be considered in determining if the county's interpretation is reasonable and correct. Central Oregon Cellular, Inc. v. Deschutes County, 33 Or LUBA 345 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The word "shall," used in a regulation, expresses what is mandatory. A local government interpretation to the contrary is indefensible and will not be affirmed by LUBA. DLCD v. Tillamook County, 33 Or LUBA 163 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Mandatory code requirements cannot be subverted by a local government interpretation. DLCD v. Tillamook County, 33 Or LUBA 163 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA cannot employ the rules of statutory construction to interpret plan and code provisions even when it does so only as a means to establish a baseline from which to determine whether a local government interpretation is "clearly wrong" or "beyond a colorable defense." Downtown Community Assoc. v. City of Portland, 33 Or LUBA 140 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a city's interpretation of a variance criterion is not inconsistent with the purpose and policy of the applicable chapter of the local code, as stated in that chapter's intent and purpose statement, the city's interpretation is not indefensible. Shaffer v. City of Salem, 33 Or LUBA 57 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In the context of a land use application, the county's interpretation of the code term "owner" to mean "authorized agent" is not indefensible, and LUBA will defer to it under ORS 197.829(1). Nash v. Crook County, 33 Or LUBA 51 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will not defer under ORS 197.829(1) to implicit interpretations of the local zoning ordinance. Nash v. Crook County, 33 Or LUBA 51 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county determines that an apparent conflict exists between state statute and county code regarding whether livestock sales and shows are permitted on EFU land, LUBA will defer to the county's decision to clarify the nature of the use through a quasi-judicial use classification hearing. Collins v. Klamath County, 32 Or LUBA 338 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the county interprets "high value farm land" for purposes of its ordinance to mean "predominantly high value farm land," and concludes that because the subject property consists of predominantly non-high value farmland, a golf course is permitted as a conditional use, LUBA will defer to the county's interpretation of its own code. Just v. Linn County, 32 Or LUBA 325 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In the absence of a reviewable interpretation concerning the applicability of a possibly relevant zoning code provision, LUBA will remand for an interpretation. DeBates v. Yamhill County, 32 Or LUBA 276 (1997).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The county is not bound by a hearings officer's previous legal interpretation of a local ordinance where the county determines that the earlier interpretation is incorrect. Marquam Farms Corp. v. Multnomah County, 32 Or LUBA 240 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to the county's "implicit" interpretation of a local ordinance. Marquam Farms Corp. v. Multnomah County, 32 Or LUBA 240 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In reviewing a hearings officer's decision, where LUBA is unable to fathom the meaning of a local ordinance and no interpretation is provided by the hearings officer, LUBA will give the county the opportunity to interpret the code in the first instance. Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 32 Or LUBA 212 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Since the rule of deference to a local government's interpretation of its plan and land use regulations, which is codified in ORS 197.829(1), does not apply to our review of local government decisions not made by the governing body, the exceptions to the rule, set forth in ORS 197.829(1)(a) to (d), also do not apply. ODOT v. Clackamas County, 32 Or LUBA 118 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will affirm the city planning bureau's determination that a proposed probation/parole office is an office use, permitted of right in a General Commercial zone, where that determination is reasonable and correct. North Portland Citizens v. City of Portland, 32 Or LUBA 70 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to the county governing body's interpretation of a plan policy as being applicable when development approval is sought rather than when the plan map is amended. Helvetia Community Assoc. v. Washington County, 31 Or LUBA 446 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local ordinance states that grading operations will not be permitted in open drainageways unless the building official finds that such an operation "will not adversely affect the existing and ultimate developments or land adjacent to a drainageway," the city's interpretation of that language to require consideration of "existing and ultimate developments on land adjacent to a drainageway" is not so wrong as to be beyond a colorable defense. Fechtig v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 410 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When a city's final decision does not contain an interpretation of a comprehensive plan provision, LUBA need not remand for an interpretation, but may itself determine whether the city's decision is correct. Stewart v. City of Brookings, 31 Or LUBA 325 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Given the express language in Goal 3 that future availability of water for irrigation must be considered in evaluating suitability of soils for agricultural uses, the county's interpretation that it need not consider potential availability of irrigation in determining soil suitability is incorrect, and LUBA will not defer to that interpretation. Doob v. Josephine County, 31 Or LUBA 275 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local comprehensive plan provision is designed to implement, and in fact essentially mirrors, the requirements for compliance with Goal 3, LUBA owes deference to the local government's interpretation only to the extent that interpretation is consistent with Goal 3. Doob v. Josephine County, 31 Or LUBA 275 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829(2), in the absence of local findings, LUBA may interpret the applicability of the city's comprehensive plan provisions in the first instance. Friends of Indian Ford v. Deschutes County, 31 Or LUBA 248 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829(2), enacted in 1995, LUBA is not required to remand decisions for local government interpretations of local provisions when LUBA is able to make the necessary interpretations. Friends of Metolius v. Jefferson County, 31 Or LUBA 160 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), and ORS 197.829(1), LUBA must defer to local government interpretations of traditional variance standards, including those made without reference to traditional strict interpretations. DeBardelaben v. Tillamook County, 31 Or LUBA 131 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The informal adoption by a statement in a quasi-judicial decision of a definition of the term "firearms training facility," which term is found in both a state administrative rule and the county's zoning ordinance, does not constitute the amendment of an acknowledged land use regulation. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Washington County, 31 Or LUBA 115 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's conclusion that one term in its code can be used to define a somewhat different term is within its interpretive discretion, and is not so wrong as to be beyond a colorable defense. Winkler v. City of Cottage Grove, 30 Or LUBA 351 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA cannot defer to a local government's interpretation of its own ordinance when it cannot discern what the interpretation is, and will not exercise its discretion under ORS 197.829(2) to interpret a county provision in the first instance where the purpose of the provision is unclear and subject to numerous interpretations. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Because relevant state statutes remain applicable to local land use decisions after acknowledgment of local regulations, a local government "legislative interpretation" of a statute does not supersede the statute itself. Ramsay v. Linn County, 30 Or LUBA 283 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. If the local government's interpretation of its own code regarding the scope of a proposed partition contravenes the express language of the code, LUBA will not defer to that interpretation. Tognoli v. Crook County, 30 Or LUBA 272 (1996).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Even if an interpretation of a local ordinance is colorable on its face, it may be inconsistent with the express language, purpose and policy underlying the ordinance and expressed in a comprehensive plan. In such cases, LUBA cannot affirm the local government's interpretation under ORS 197.829(1)(a) to (c). DLCD v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 221 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. City's interpretation of local wetland mitigation policy to "preserve wetland habitat" as allowing replacement of .05 acres of existing wetland with a larger wetland area is not clearly wrong and must be affirmed. Noble v. City of Fairview, 30 Or LUBA 180 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. It is within the county's interpretive discretion to find that a code provision protecting agricultural land for farm use conflicts with a plan policy that certain land is not suitable for agricultural production and is committed to residential development. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 30 Or LUBA 135 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829(2), in the absence of a local interpretation, LUBA may interpret an ordinance to determine whether a local government decision is correct. Canby Quality of Life Committee v. City of Canby, 30 Or LUBA 166 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The city was clearly correct in classifying a proposed recycling processing center as a "waste and/or recycling transfer operation" which is an allowed conditional use under local ordinance. Canby Quality of Life Committee v. City of Canby, 30 Or LUBA 166 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. While ORS 197.829(2) allows LUBA to interpret local land use regulations in the absence of interpretations by the local government, LUBA need not search the record, or make interpretations or draw conclusions that are not clearly evident. Canby Quality of Life Committee v. City of Canby, 30 Or LUBA 166 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), LUBA will defer to a city's interpretation that a comprehensive plan provision setting residential densities establishes a maximum density for specific zones which can be reduced in particular circumstances. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 30 Or LUBA 85 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan policy limiting the clearing of vegetation on Neabeack Hill to that which is "necessary for housing, roads, and utilities" does not require that the city reduce the permitted density of a proposed planned unit development to preserve more natural vegetation than necessary for development consistent with the applicable zoning. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city's application of a comprehensive plan policy intended to preserve vegetation to a proposed planned unit development actually ensures more preservation of vegetation than required by the express language of the policy, the city's interpretation of the policy is not clearly wrong. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. To challenge successfully the city's interpretation of a comprehensive plan format and provisions and the city's conclusion that two plan provisions are not land use regulations, a petitioner must establish that the city's interpretation of the contested plan provisions is clearly wrong. Fraser v. City of Joseph, 30 Or LUBA 13 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioners contend the governing body failed to follow procedures arguably required by the local code for making the challenged legislative land use decision, LUBA must defer to the governing body's interpretation of the code and cannot interpret the code provisions in the first instance. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. Portland, 29 Or LUBA 429 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city's zoning code allows private households in the commercial-service/professional zone so long as the private households meet the development standards of a multi-family zone, LUBA will affirm the city's interpretation that private households includes a multiplex dwelling. Stevens v. City of Medford, 29 Or LUBA 422 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the city's zoning code provides that some permitted uses are subject to special use restrictions, LUBA will affirm the city's interpretation that the existence of special use restrictions does not convert a permitted use into an unpermitted use. Stevens v. City of Medford, 29 Or LUBA 422 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will not defer to a local government's interpretation of a state regulation. Testa v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 383 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local governing body's interpretation of Standard Industrial Code Manual provisions incorporated into the local government's own zoning ordinance, unless that interpretation is contrary to the express words, purpose or policy of the local enactment or to a state statute, statewide planning goal or administrative rule which the local enactment implements. Pend-Air Citizen's Comm. v. City of Pendleton, 29 Or LUBA 362 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Although LUBA owes no deference to a hearings officer's interpretation of a local enactment, LUBA may remand a challenged decision in cases where the interpretation at issue is not explained in the findings or differs from an earlier interpretation, in order to give the hearings officer an opportunity to interpret the local enactment in the first instance. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. If the local governing body's interpretation of its comprehensive plan as not already designating the subject property as a 1B aggregate resources site, or providing a method of doing so without amending the acknowledged plan, is not clearly wrong, LUBA will defer to the governing body's interpretation. O'Rourke v. Union County, 29 Or LUBA 303 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code specifically requires the application of a historic landmark designation to be consistent with comprehensive plan historic preservation policies, but does not indicate any plan policies are applicable to decisions on permits for demolition of property subject to the historic landmark designation, the local governing body is not clearly wrong in interpreting the plan and code to provide that no plan policies are applicable to its review of such a demolition permit application. Save Amazon Coalition v. City of Eugene, 29 Or LUBA 238 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where an ordinance changing the plan and zone designations of the subject property provides the property will revert to its former designations if a final order denying a conditional use permit (CUP) for a mobile home park is issued, the local governing body acts within its interpretive discretion in deciding the contingency is not met when LUBA remands a local government decision approving a CUP for a mobile home park and the local government does not take further action on that application. Burghardt v. City of Molalla, 29 Or LUBA 223 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local governing body acts within its interpretive discretion in interpreting a code conditional use permit standard regarding feasibility of meeting "projected increased demand" for school facilities to refer to current demand, plus demand from other developments that have received final approval and the demand created by the proposed development, and not to include demand from future permitted development of residentially zoned land. Burghardt v. City of Molalla, 29 Or LUBA 223 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where determining whether a notice of intent to appeal was timely filed under ORS 197.830(3) depends on determining which code notice of hearing provision applied to the local proceeding, and LUBA can infer from the challenged decision which notice provision the local governing body believes governs the local proceeding and agrees with that interpretation, even without the deference required by Clark, LUBA is not required to remand the decision for the governing body to make its interpretation explicit. Orenco Neighborhood v. City of Hillsboro, 29 Or LUBA 186 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a code contains both a provision governing the expiration of quasi-judicial land use approvals generally and a provision specifically governing the expiration of planned development approvals, the local governing body is within its discretion under ORS 197.829 and Clark in interpreting the code to mean the expiration of planned development approvals is governed only by the specific code provision. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 29 Or LUBA 90

(1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the code provides "if no extensions are granted, the authorization shall expire," the local governing body is within its discretion under ORS 197.829 and Clark in interpreting this provision to mean that if an extension is requested prior to the expiration of the approval period, the approval does not expire while local government review of the extension request is pending. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 29 Or LUBA 90 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. If a code includes provisions for extending planned development approvals and for requesting changes in approved final development plans, the local governing body is within its discretion under ORS 197.829 and Clark in interpreting these provisions together to mean if a change in an approved final development plan is requested before the original approval expires, the approval does not expire while the modification application is being processed, and a separate extension application is not necessary. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 29 Or LUBA 90 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to a hearings officer's interpretation of a local code. Walker v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 22 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Even under the highly deferential review standard imposed by ORS 197.829 and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 514-15, 836 P2d 710 (1992), a local governing body cannot interpret an "exceptional or extraordinary circumstances * * * which do not apply generally to other properties in the same vicinity" variance standard to include any circumstance that does not apply uniformly to all, or nearly all, properties in the vicinity. Wicks v. City of Reedsport, 29 Or LUBA 8 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is required to defer to a local governing body's interpretation of any enactment which the governing body of that jurisdiction adopted, regardless of whether the governing body of another jurisdiction also adopted the same enactment. Opus Development Corp. v. City of Eugene, 28 Or LUBA 670 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA's review of a hearings officer's interpretation of a local code provision is to determine whether the interpretation is reasonable and correct. Huiras v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 667 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In reviewing a decision adopted by a local governing body, LUBA must review the governing body's interpretation of local code provisions and may not interpret the local code in the first instance, unless there is "no possible rational dispute" regarding the correct interpretation. Champion v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 618 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where individual guidelines made applicable by an overlay zone are expressed in nonmandatory terms, a governing body is well within its interpretive discretion in determining compliance with such guidelines is not required, even where the code provides that overlay zone provisions supersede provisions of the base zone. Champion v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 618 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a governing body's interpretation of a traditional local code "unnecessary hardship" variance standard, where the governing body determines that so long as some beneficial use of the subject property could be established, the unnecessary hardship standard is not satisfied. Duck Delivery Produce v. Deschutes County, 28 Or LUBA 614 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council's interpretation of a city code "unreasonable hardships or practical difficulties" variance standard, as requiring that it be "extremely difficult" to use the subject property for a proposed concrete operation without the requested variance, is not clearly wrong and, therefore, must be affirmed. Salem Golf Club v. City of Salem, 28 Or LUBA 561 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the challenged decision is adopted by the governing body, LUBA must grant considerable deference to the governing body's interpretations of the local code and cannot interpret the local code in the first instance. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is not required to defer to a hearing's officer's interpretation of the local code under ORS 197.829 or Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 515, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Rather, LUBA's review of a hearings officer's interpretation is to determine whether the interpretation is reasonable and correct. Ellison v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 521 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government acts within its interpretational discretion in construing local code provisions that treat "contiguous" parcels in "common ownership" as a single unit of land as not including parcels in common ownership which meet only at a common corner and share no common sides. Tognoli v. Crook County, 28 Or LUBA 527 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government acts within its interpretive discretion in interpreting comprehensive plan policies requiring "protection and preservation" of certain natural resources together with other plan policies calling for construction of a particular roadway to allow construction of the roadway, provided impacts on the natural resources are limited. Friends of Cedar Mill v. Washington County, 28 Or LUBA 477 (1995).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local government determined comprehensive plan objectives are mandatory approval standards in a recently appealed local decision, it may not later determine that plan objectives are mere guidelines and not mandatory approval standards in a different decision appealed to LUBA, in the absence of some explanation for the disparity. Welch v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 439 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the code does not specifically require that the county hearings officer make the initial interpretation concerning whether a nonconforming use exists and the nature and extent of that nonconforming use at the time restrictive zoning was applied, the board of commissioners is not clearly wrong in interpreting the code to grant the planning director authority to make such initial determinations. Spurgin v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 383 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to a local government's interpretation of an administrative rule promulgated by a state agency. Sensible Transportation v. Washington County, 28 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government's interpretation that the term "development" used in the local code does not include zone changes. Neuman v. City of Albany, 28 Or LUBA 337 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When reviewing an interpretation of a local enactment by a local decision maker other than the local governing body, LUBA's acceptance or rejection of the interpretation is determined solely by whether the interpretation is right or wrong. Gage v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 307 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829, LUBA is required to afford deference to local interpretations of local comprehensive plans and land use regulations only when those interpretations are made by the local governing body. Gage v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 307 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Code provisions that provide interim resource protection to property not on a local government's acknowledged Goal 5 resource inventories, until the Goal 5 planning process can be carried out, do not implement Goal 5. Therefore, local interpretations of such code provisions are not subject to reversal by LUBA under ORS 197.829(4). Gage v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 307 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The scope and proper construction of the term "commercial activities that are in conjunction with farm use," used in ORS 215.213(2)(c) and 215.283(2)(a), is a question of state law. LUBA is not required to defer to a local government hearings officer's understanding of the scope of that term. City of Sandy v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 316 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That LUBA may consider a statewide planning goal that is implemented by a particular plan or code provision, in determining whether the local government's interpretation of the plan or code provision should be affirmed under ORS 197.829(4), does not make that goal an approval standard for decisions made under an acknowledged plan and land use regulations. Knee Deep Cattle Company v. Lane County, 28 Or LUBA 288 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is not required to give a planning director's interpretation of local regulations the deference LUBA must afford to a governing body's interpretation of local regulations. Rather, LUBA reviews a planning director's interpretation to determine whether that interpretation is reasonable and correct. Knee Deep Cattle Company v. Lane County, 28 Or LUBA 288 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local governing body is not entitled to interpretive deference under ORS 197.829 and Clark v. Jackson County when interpreting statutory requirements for home occupations. Holsheimer v. Columbia County, 28 Or LUBA 279 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code creates a process for the submittal and review of an applicant's "development impact statement" (DIS) as part of preliminary subdivision plat approval, the local governing body has considerable discretion in interpreting the role of the DIS process and must determine, in the first instance, whether the DIS content requirements are mere requests for information or impose substantive approval standards. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 28 Or LUBA 263 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a challenged city council decision approving the provision of city sewer and water services outside city limits does not interpret arguably relevant comprehensive plan provisions with regard to whether they are approval criteria for the challenged decision, LUBA must remand the decision to the city to adopt such interpretations, before LUBA can determine whether the challenged decision is a land use decision subject to LUBA review. Fraser v. City of Joseph, 28 Or LUBA 217 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes no deference to interpretations of local code provisions adopted by local decision makers other than the governing body. Derry v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 212 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A hearings officer's interpretation of a conditional use permit for a "tourist park" as not allowing placement of mobile homes within the approved "tourist park," as that term is defined by the local code, is reasonable and correct. Jones v. Lane County, 28 Or LUBA 193 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of a code "compatibility" standard as not requiring consideration of "view impacts" is not "clearly wrong" and will be sustained by LUBA. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county adopts an urban growth management agreement requiring incorporation of city zoning ordinance and comprehensive plan provisions into the county's zoning ordinance and comprehensive plan, with regard to unincorporated land within the city's UGB, LUBA will extend the deference required by ORS 197.829 and Clark v. Jackson County to the county governing body's interpretation of city plan and zoning ordinance provisions when the county makes a land use decision concerning property within the UGB. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 178 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county governing body's interpretation of the term "severe geologic hazard," as used in its comprehensive plan, is not so wrong as to be beyond colorable defense, LUBA will defer to it. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 178 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where local conditional use approval standards do not specifically refer to impacts on property values, but rather to compatibility with "uses" and "land use patterns" and changes in "accepted farm or forest practices" or their cost, a local governing body is within its discretion under ORS 197.829 in interpreting such standards not to require consideration of a proposed conditional use's impact on property values. Tucker v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 134 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county governing body's interpretation that an otherwise applicable code permit standard requiring "Class I-IV soils [to] be preserved and maintained for farm use" is not applicable to land for which an exception to Statewide Planning Goal 3 (Agricultural Lands) has been adopted as part of the acknowledged county comprehensive plan, is not "clearly wrong," and is within the governing body's discretion under ORS 197.829. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 28 Or LUBA 123 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In reviewing a local government hearings officer's interpretation of a land use regulation, LUBA determines whether the interpretation is reasonable and correct. The deference to a local governing body interpretation required by ORS 197.829 does not apply to interpretations by hearings officers. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a challenged decision was not adopted by the governing body of the local government, LUBA owes no deference to the interpretations of local enactments expressed in that decision. Pickrell v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 103 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. Where a particular activity is allowed as a conditional use, and is subject to criteria specifically and solely applicable to such activity, the governing body acts within its interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829 in determining such activity is not also subject to criteria generally applicable to conditional uses in the zone. Cole v. Columbia County, 28 Or LUBA 62 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A city council acts within its interpretive authority under ORS 197.829 in applying a code provision as a mandatory approval standard, notwithstanding its use of the word "should." So long as the city makes it clear that it does interpret the code provision as a mandatory approval standard, it need not explain why in its decision. Davis v. City of Bandon, 28 Or LUBA 38 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829, LUBA is required to defer to a local governing body's interpretation of its own enactment, unless that interpretation is contrary to the express words, purpose or policy of the local enactment or to a state statute, statewide planning goal or administrative rule which the local enactment implements. Melton v. City of Cottage Grove, 28 Or LUBA 1 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. If a local government is presented with a plan or land use regulation provision that must be interpreted, and there is a reasonable interpretation that is consistent with the "state statute, land use goal or rule the comprehensive plan provision or land use regulation implements," that interpretation may not be rejected by the local government in favor of an interpretation that is inconsistent with those statutes, goals or rules. Historical Development Advocates v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 617 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 197.829(4) was not adopted to allow LUBA to reconsider the propriety of the original acknowledgment of comprehensive plans and land use regulations. Identification of an allegedly incorrect interpretation of such acknowledged comprehensive plan or land use regulation provisions is a condition precedent for invoking review under ORS 197.829(4). Historical Development Advocates v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 617 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where nothing in its comprehensive plan or code requires that a particular level of service be maintained at affected street intersections at all times, the local government's interpretation of its plan and code as allowing short traffic system failures for infrequent, large, special events is not clearly wrong, and LUBA will defer to it. Heine v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 571 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a document was originally drafted by state agency staff, but was never adopted by that agency as an administrative rule, and is applicable to a challenged local government decision only because it is incorporated by reference into the local code, under ORS 197.829 LUBA is neither required nor allowed to give deference to an interpretation of that document by an agency staff member. Furler v. Curry County, 27 Or LUBA 546 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provides that a planning commission decision becomes final 10 days after "submittal" of the written decision to the clerk of the governing body, the local government is not clearly wrong in interpreting "submittal" to the clerk to mean "receipt" by the clerk, and its interpretation will be sustained. McKenzie v. Multnomah County, 27 Or LUBA 523 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government acts within its interpretive discretion in interpreting a plan policy that "residential development should only be encouraged" in certain areas not to be an approval standard for individual development applications. Furler v. Curry County, 27 Or LUBA 497 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. When LUBA reviews land use decisions for compliance with relevant approval standards, it does not matter whether the challenged decision is consistent with prior decisions, so long as the decision correctly interprets and applies the applicable standard. Furler v. Curry County, 27 Or LUBA 497 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's interpretation of the term "motel," as defined by local ordinance, to include a particular development is not contrary to the express words, policy or purpose of that ordinance, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation. Kaady v. City of Cannon Beach, 27 Or LUBA 464 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the applicability of local comprehensive plan or land use regulation provisions is ambiguous, the local government is entitled to considerable deference in determining their applicability. Salem-Keizer School Dist. 24-J v. City of Salem, 27 Or LUBA 351 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision does not explicitly state the requirements listed thereunder for a complete development application are "jurisdictional," the local government's interpretation of the code provision as imposing procedural rather than jurisdictional requirements is not inconsistent with the express words, purpose or policy of the code and, therefore, must be affirmed. BCT Partnership v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 278 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government acts within the interpretive discretion afforded by ORS 197.829 in finding a code requirement for a statement of the nature of the applicant's interest in the subject property is satisfied where the application states the applicant is the "future property owner" and there is evidence in the record that the applicant has acquired or will acquire the property. BCT Partnership v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 278 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. A local government is within its interpretive discretion in counting an access driveway separated by a median into two one-way driveways as two access points, for purposes of satisfying the number of access points required by the local code. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 27 Or LUBA 243 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. That other inapplicable sections of the local code permit one-way driveways with a minimum 15-foot pavement width provides no basis for allowing 15-foot-wide paved driveways where the applicable code section unambiguously requires a 24-foot pavement width. Such an interpretation is clearly wrong, and exceeds the local government's interpretive discretion. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 27 Or LUBA 243 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829, LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own enactments, unless the local interpretation is contrary to the express words, purpose or policy of the enactment, or is inconsistent with a statute, goal or rule that the enactment implements. Shelter Resources, Inc. v. City of Cannon Beach, 27 Or LUBA 229 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code explicitly establishes a right to a local appeal only for decisions made pursuant to certain procedures set out in the code, a the local government's interpretation that no local appeal is available if the decision sought to be appealed was not made through those procedures is not clearly wrong, and LUBA will defer to it. Forest Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 215 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The meaning of the term "standards and criteria" in ORS 227.178(3) is a question of state law, and a city's interpretation and application of this term does not bind LUBA. The role of the term "standards and criteria" in ORS 227.178(3) is to assure both proponents and opponents of an application that the substantive factors that are actually applied and that have a meaningful impact on a decision permitting or denying an application will remain constant throughout the proceedings. Forest Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 215 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829(4), if a comprehensive plan provision or land use regulation is clearly designed to implement a statewide planning goal or goals, a local government may not interpret such a plan provision or land use regulation in a manner inconsistent with the goals it implements. DLCD v. City of Donald, 27 Or LUBA 208 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a Transitional Timber zone provides that uses of land "not specifically mentioned" in that zone are prohibited, and the principal uses permitted outright in the zone are resource and resource-related uses, not commercial uses, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation that the zone does not allow parking, storage and maintenance of a commercial truck. Watson v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 164 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A comprehensive plan policy that "urban services shall only be established within recognized urban growth boundaries" implements Goals 11 and 14. Because Goals 11 and 14 prohibit the extension of urban level services outside of urban growth boundaries, LUBA will not defer to a local government interpretation of that plan policy as allowing extension of service from an urban sewage treatment plant to a rural area. ORS 197.829(4). DLCD v. Fargo Interchange Service District, 27 Or LUBA 150 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code contains a variety of arguably relevant provisions that equally support different interpretations, the selection of an interpretation is for the local government to make. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 106 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code provides that nonconforming use rights are lost if the site of a nonconforming use is "vacant" for two continuous years, and also provides that words used in the code have their normal dictionary meaning, the local government may interpret "vacant" to mean "free from activity" consistent with the nonconforming use rights, but cannot embellish that definition by adding a requirement for the absence of "a bona fide effort to provide goods and services for profit." Rhine v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 86 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to local government decisions giving different interpretations to the same language appearing in different sections of its code, where there are related code provisions that provide some justification for the different construction of such identical code language. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government operates within its interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829 when it interprets a code requirement that a proposed conditional use "fully accords with all applicable standards of the County and State Laws or regulations" to be satisfied, where the applicant demonstrates during the local proceedings that there are "no unusual circumstances or conditions which would prevent [subsequent] issuance of required regulatory approvals." Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government interpretation of its sign ordinance that regardless of whether a sign is an awning, fascia or other sign type, it is subject to certain measurement requirements, is not contrary to the express words, policy or context of the ordinance, and LUBA will defer to it. Heath Northwest, Inc. v. City of Portland, 26 Or LUBA 535 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.829, it is unclear whether LUBA is to defer to a local government interpretation of a prior local government decision or whether LUBA is required to determine whether the local government interpretation is reasonable and correct. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The noninterference standard of ORS 215.283(3)(b) applies directly to land in a county EFU zone, and EFU zone provisions implementing ORS 215.283(3)(b) may not be interpreted inconsistently with the statute. DLCD v. Crook County, 26 Or LUBA 478 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA may not interpret a local government's enactments, in the first instance, to determine what constitutes the local approval standards for, and how those standards apply to, a challenged decision. Rather, LUBA is required to review the local government's interpretation of its own enactments. Rea v. City of Seaside, 26 Or LUBA 444 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioners do not argue that a local code provision governing local appeal procedures implements some requirement imposed on the local government by a state statute, statewide planning goal or administrative rule, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation of its code provision, unless that interpretation is clearly wrong. Bjerk v. Deschutes County, 26 Or LUBA 439 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government interpretation of a plan policy as governing how it inventories, plans and zones its forestland, and as not applying to a decision approving a non-forestland division and dwelling, will be sustained where the interpretation is consistent with the words and apparent purpose of the policy. Draganowski v. Curry County, 26 Or LUBA 420 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. 1993 Oregon Laws, chapter 792, section 43, codifies Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), with the exception that LUBA is not required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its regulations if that interpretation is contrary to a state statute, statewide planning goal or administrative rule which the regulations implement. Testa v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 357 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation of its code provisions on farm dwellings is within the interpretive discretion afforded local governments by Clark v. Jackson County and 1993 Oregon Laws, chapter 792, section 43, so long as its interpretation does not provide less protection to EFU-zoned land than what ORS 215.283(1)(f) and OAR 660-05-030(4) provide. Testa v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 357 (1994).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under Oregon Laws 1993, chapter 792, section 43(4), LUBA is not required to affirm a local government's interpretation of its own code provision if that interpretation is "contrary to a state statute, land use goal or [administrative] rule that the [code provision] implements." Pacific Rivers Council, Inc. v. Lane County, 26 Or LUBA 323 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government

Interpretation. LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own ordinances, unless the interpretation is clearly contrary to the express words, policy or context of the enactment. Lane v. City of Klamath Falls, 26 Or LUBA 295 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. ORS 215.283(3)(d) must be independently applied to an application for division of EFU-zoned land and requires that the entire EFU-zoned parcel be found to be generally unsuitable for farm use, regardless of whether local regulations impose a more relaxed standard on homestead lot divisions. Geiselman v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 260 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government interprets a "situated upon generally unsuitable land" approval standard for nonforest dwellings and land divisions in a forest zone to require that the entire subject parcel be generally unsuitable for the production of farm or forest products, and that interpretation is not contrary to the express words, policy or context of that standard, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation. Alexanderson v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 209 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), there can easily be more than one affirmable local government interpretation of a particular code provision. Nevertheless, Clark does not allow a local government arbitrarily to vary its interpretation of an approval standard when acting on permit applications. Friends of Bryant Woods Park v. Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 185 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA cannot interpret a local government's ordinances in the first instance, but rather must review the local government's interpretation of its ordinances. Consequently, the failure of the local government to make the initial interpretation of local ordinance provisions is a basis for remand. Friends of Bryant Woods Park v. Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 185 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code defines an accessory use or structure as one which is subordinate to and serves a principal structure or principal use, a local government is within its interpretive discretion under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), to require that the principal use or structure exist before an accessory structure or use may be approved. McPeek v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 165 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's interpretation of its code that a retaining wall is not within the local code's definition of "building" is not clearly wrong, LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Wood v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 121 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a question of proper interpretation of a comprehensive plan provision is raised during local proceedings, the interpretation required for LUBA review of the decision on appeal must be provided in the decision. The local government may not supply the interpretation in its brief on appeal. Eskandarian v. City of Portland, 26 Or LUBA 98 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the challenged decision interprets a local code standard for nonforest dwellings to require that an entire parcel be generally unsuitable for farm or forest uses, and that interpretation is not clearly contrary to the words, policy or context of the code, LUBA will defer to it. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under ORS 197.835(7)(a)(D) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), LUBA must defer to a local government's interpretation of "applicable law" adopted by the local government, regardless of whether that applicable law is a zoning ordinance or conditions of approval imposed by a prior quasi-judicial order. Perry v. Yamhill County, 26 Or LUBA 73 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's interpretation of its own comprehensive plan that the introductory sections in the land use chapter are not independent approval standards is not clearly wrong, LUBA must defer to that interpretation. Moore v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 40 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government's interpretation of a code requirement, that a PUD tentative plan covering a portion of property under single ownership be accompanied by a statement proving the entire property can be developed and used in accord with code standards, as requiring that the PUD not render the remainder of the property undevelopable. McGowan v. City of Eugene, 26 Or LUBA 9 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A county may interpret a comprehensive plan provision prohibiting plan map amendments designating "forest lands" for rural development as referring to the definition of "forest lands" contained in Goal 4 when the comprehensive plan provision was adopted. Such an interpretation would not allow development that would otherwise be prohibited by the current version of Goal 4 and, therefore, is not inconsistent with the current version of Goal 4. Westfair Associates Partnership v. Lane County, 25 Or LUBA 729 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's interpretation of a particular code provision is expressed in a motion to dismiss an appeal before LUBA, rather than in the challenged decision itself, LUBA is not required to defer to the local government's interpretation. City of Grants Pass v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 722 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. The proper interpretation of state statutes is a question of law for LUBA to decide, and is not subject to the limitations that Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), places on LUBA's review of interpretations of local enactments. Spiering v. Yamhill County, 25 Or LUBA 695 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Notwithstanding that LUBA may prefer a different interpretation of local code provisions, where the local decision maker's interpretation of the local code is not internally inconsistent and not clearly wrong, LUBA will defer to it. DLCD v. Crook County, 25 Or LUBA 625 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the challenged decision contains an interpretation of the local code that a particular standard is inapplicable to the proposed development, and that interpretation is not clearly contrary to the express words, policy or context of the local code, LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Choban v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 572 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's interpretation of its own code, that a county department manager may initiate an application for development approval on behalf of the local government, is not clearly contrary to the express words, policy or context of the local code, LUBA will defer to it. Choban v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 572 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA owes local governments no deference in interpreting state law. However, where a number of the issues raised in the petition for review do not turn on interpretation of state law, the presence of questions of state law does not, alone, make a voluntary remand inappropriate. Hastings Bulb Growers, Inc. v. Curry County, 25 Or LUBA 558 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a challenged decision simply expresses a conclusion that the county court has discretion to act on a subdivision application without that application having first been acted on by the county planning commission, but does not identify the source of that discretion or interpret apparently relevant code provisions, the basis for the challenged decision is not sufficiently articulated for review, and the challenged decision must be remanded. Larson v. Wallowa County, 25 Or LUBA 537 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the challenged decision includes contradictory findings regarding compliance with an applicable local code approval standard, LUBA cannot interpret the standard itself, but rather must remand the decision to the local government to interpret the standard in the first instance. Larson v. Wallowa County, 25 Or LUBA 537 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code states that "failure to comply with this subsection shall be a jurisdictional defect," and a local appellant fails to establish compliance with that subsection, the local government is free to interpret its code to require dismissal of the local appeal, and LUBA will defer to that interpretation. DLCD v. Wasco County, 25 Or LUBA 529 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a farm dwelling approval standard in a local code requires a county to consider the median size of commercial farms in a specific area, as reported by certain government agencies or "other similar source," it is within the county's discretion to interpret the "other similar source" provision to allow it to consider relevant evidence from the county planning department, county assessor's office or other reliable sources. Giesy v. Benton County, 25 Or LUBA 493 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government determination that occasionally staying on the subject property in a travel trailer is not residential use of the property for purposes of determining whether a nonconforming residential use has been "discontinued," is not a clearly wrong interpretation of the code, and LUBA will defer to it. Cemper v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 486 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government interpretation of a code "lot of record" provision as allowing legally created but now substandard lots to be separately developed if adjoining lots are held in separate ownership or if the lots were shown on a plat of record prior to the date the relevant zoning requirements took effect is reasonable, and LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Campbell v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 479 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. So long as the local decision maker (whether the governing body, planning commission, hearings officer or some other body) has authority to interpret local enactments, its interpretation is the interpretation of the local government, to which LUBA is required to defer under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Gage v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 449 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code requires that home occupations occupy no more than 1000 square feet of an accessory building, an interpretation of that provision as excluding portions of the accessory building used to access the part of the accessory building used for the home occupation makes full use of the local government's interpretative discretion. Weuster v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 425 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a county interprets a forest zone requirement that nonforest uses be located on generally unsuitable land for production of farm or forest products as requiring consideration of the suitability of the entire parcel, the county exercises its interpretive discretion to the fullest in interpreting a home occupation approval standard that incorporates the nonforest use standard by reference, as requiring consideration of only the land under the existing building where the home occupation will be located. Weuster v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 425 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own ordinances, so long as the proffered interpretation is not clearly wrong. Oregon Raptor Center v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 401 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code expresses an intent not to duplicate state mobile home park approval standards, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation that the state approval standard in ORS 446.100(1)(a) is not part of the "applicable Oregon Law," which the code requires to be considered in making permit decisions. Frankton Neigh. Assoc. v. Hood River County, 25 Or LUBA 386 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA may not interpret a local government's comprehensive plan in the first instance, rather the local government must interpret its own plan, and LUBA may review that interpretation. Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Seaside, 25 Or LUBA 367 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA must defer to a local government's interpretation of its own land use regulations unless the interpretation is clearly wrong. A county interpretation that a facility for an annual equestrian event qualifies as a "rodeo" or a "livestock arena" is not clearly wrong. Cooley v. Deschutes County, 25 Or LUBA 350 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a code provision governing notice of decisions on a certain type of land use action does not expressly provide it applies only to a decision by the planning director, LUBA will defer to a local government's interpretation that the code provision also applies to a decision by the hearings officer on appeal from a decision by the planning director. Reusser v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 252 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where one code provision requires a local government's notice of decision to identify the local appeal fee, and another provision states that failure to pay the proper local appeal fee prior to expiration of the period for filing an appeal constitutes a "jurisdictional" defect, the local government may interpret the two code provisions together to mean that the period for filing an appeal does not begin to run until the required notice of decision, identifying the proper appeal fee, is provided to the appealing party. Reusser v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 252 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's subdivision approval standards limit the length of cul-de-sac streets, as measured from through-traffic streets, and it is reasonable to interpret the limitation as being measured from either existing through-traffic streets or both existing and proposed through-traffic streets, LUBA will defer to the local government's selection of the latter interpretation. Miller v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is limited to considering the interpretations of ambiguous code language that are adopted by the decision-making body and may not consider interpretations that are not adopted by the decision maker, even if the offered interpretation is reasonable. Miller v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under a local code standard requiring that arterial streets not "penetrate identifiable neighborhoods," LUBA will defer to the local government's determination of what constitutes an identifiable neighborhood, unless the local government's determination is clearly wrong. Mannenbach v. City of Dallas, 25 Or LUBA 136 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government determines a use does not fit neatly into any of the available definitional categories in its code, but provides a reasonable explanation for categorizing the use according to its primary use, LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Glisan Street Assoc., Ltd. v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 116 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the local code includes an exception to the term "wetland" for wetlands created by "human activity as part of an approved development project," and there is no dispute that the subject wetland was created with the knowledge and consent of the local government, it is clearly wrong for the local government to fail to consider whether the wetland is within the local code exception. Annett v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 111 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Local government interpretations that particular PUD approval standards apply only at one stage of a multi-stage approval process will be sustained where the relevant code language supports that construction. However, LUBA will reject arguments that a local code should be interpreted in that manner, where the challenged decision does not interpret and apply the local code in that way and the local government's interpretation and application of its code is not clearly wrong. DLCD v. Crook County, 25 Or LUBA 98 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government's interpretation that a local code standard requiring a determination concerning the adequacy of schools "existing or planned for the area" is satisfied by findings that there is unspent money in a school district's budget, is an interpretation of the local code that is "clearly wrong." Burghardt v. City of Molalla, 25 Or LUBA 43 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own ordinances, unless that interpretation is contrary to the express words, policy or context of the local enactment. LUBA may not interpret a local government's ordinances in the first instance, but rather must review the local government's interpretation of its ordinances. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government determines that a recreational cattle roping use was lawfully established on the date restrictive zoning was applied, because it constituted a farm use allowed outright by the subject zone, LUBA will defer to that interpretation so long as it is not clearly contrary to the express words, policy or context of the ordinance. Smith v. Lane County, 25 Or LUBA 1 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the term "vacant" in a local government's code is undefined, but the code states that undefined terms have their "normal dictionary meaning," the local government may adopt one of the available ordinary dictionary definitions of the term "vacant," and LUBA will defer to that definition of the term so long as it is not clearly contrary to the context of the code provision in which the term "vacant" is found. Rhine v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 557 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. A local government is within its interpretive discretion in interpreting the term "development" as including farming, where the code defines the term broadly and includes a nonexclusive list of examples of development that includes "site alteration such as * * * grading * * * or clearing." Trumper v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 552 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government interprets its own enactments in a way that is inconsistent with the express terms of a local provision, and there is at least one plausible interpretation of the disputed provision that is consistent with its express terms, LUBA will not defer to the local government's interpretation. McGowan v. City of Eugene, 24 Or LUBA 540 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government's determination that provisions in a comprehensive plan requiring the local government to "encourage" particular kinds of activities are not mandatory approval standards. McGowan v. City of Eugene, 24 Or LUBA 540 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA may not interpret a local government's ordinances in the first instance, but rather must review a local government's interpretation of its ordinances, and the local government interpretation must be adequate for LUBA's review. Leabo v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 495 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. If a local government has interpreted the local code in the challenged decision, LUBA must defer to that interpretation unless it is clearly contrary to the enacted language or the apparent purpose or policy of the provision. Leabo v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 495 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where LUBA must determine whether an ambiguous code provision (i.e., one that is capable of more than one sustainable interpretation) is applicable to a challenged decision, and the challenged decision does not contain a reviewable interpretation of that provision, LUBA must remand the decision for the local government to interpret the provision in the first instance. Terra v. City of Newport, 24 Or LUBA 438 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where petitioners contend a local government erred in failing to apply a code provision to the challenged decision, and the decision contains no interpretation of that code provision, but the code language unambiguously establishes that the provision in question is not applicable to the challenged decision, LUBA is not required to remand the decision so the local government can interpret its code in the first instance. Terra v. City of Newport, 24 Or LUBA 438 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In reviewing a local government's interpretation of its own ordinance, the question LUBA must resolve is not whether the local government interpretation is "right," but rather whether it is "clearly wrong." Terra v. City of Newport, 24 Or LUBA 438 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where under certain provisions of a local enactment, consideration of the geologic stability of the subject site would be relevant to the conditional use permit approval process, but other code provisions create a separate geologic hazard review process that may be initiated at any time prior to or in conjunction with filing an application for any required local permit, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation that it is not required to address geologic stability as part of the conditional use permit process. Terra v. City of Newport, 24 Or LUBA 438 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government determines an application for a home occupation on a parcel adjoining another parcel on which an earlier application for the same home occupation was denied, is an application for a "substantially similar" use, LUBA will defer to that interpretation of the local code requirement that an application may not be "substantially similar" to a previously denied application. Roozenboom v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 433 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992), the question for LUBA to resolve is not whether a local government interpretation of its own code is "right," but rather whether it is "clearly wrong." Heceta Water District v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 402 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA may not interpret a local code in the first instance, but rather must review a local government's interpretation of its code. However, a local government interpretation of its code must be adequate for LUBA's review and may not consist of a mere conclusory statement. DLCD v. Crook County, 24 Or LUBA 393 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the decision whether to designate property as Agriculture or Forest on comprehensive plan maps is governed by specific plan policies, a county acts within its discretion in determining that it is not required to apply and balance other generally applicable Agricultural and Forest plan policies. Marson Trucking, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 386 (1993).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. In the absence of a statutory policy pertaining to forestlands that, like the statutory policy concerning EFU land, requires the preservation of forestland in large blocks, LUBA cannot require that a local government interpret and apply its nonforest use "generally unsuitable" land approval standard in the same manner as the similarly worded statutory standard pertaining to nonfarm uses on EFU land. DLCD v. Coos County, 24 Or LUBA 349 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code requires a proposed nonforest dwelling site to be on land generally unsuitable for forest uses, that standard can be interpreted to mean either that the proposed nonforest dwelling site itself, or that the entire forest parcel, must be generally unsuitable for forest uses. LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between those permissible interpretations. DLCD v. Coos County, 24 Or LUBA 349 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its zoning ordinance, so long as the proffered interpretation is not "clearly contrary to the enacted language," or "inconsistent with express language of the ordinance or its apparent purpose or policy." Tylka v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 296 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government's interpretation of its own ordinance, that expansion of a nonconforming use onto property not currently utilized by the nonconforming use is not authorized, where that interpretation is not contrary to the express words or policy of the ordinance. Leopold v. City of Milwaukie, 24 Or LUBA 246 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code provision states that tree protection is a proper Justification for approval of a proposed setback reduction, the local government's interpretation that the provision allows it to approve a setback reduction to protect a particular tree, even though the setback reduction will result in the destruction of another tree, is not clearly contrary to the express terms of the code and LUBA will defer to the interpretation. Barker v. City of Cannon Beach, 24 Or LUBA 221 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a comprehensive plan policy provides that a change from a 10-acre minimum zone to a 5-acre minimum zone requires that "parcels are generally five acres," a county's interpretation of this policy to require consideration of the entire 10-acre minimum zoned area that includes the subject property is not "clearly contrary" to the terms of, or "inconsistent with the express language" or "apparent purpose and policy" of, the plan policy and must be upheld. Thatcher v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 207 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA will defer to a local government's interpretation of its code so long as the proffered interpretation is not "clearly contrary to the enacted language," or "inconsistent with express language of the ordinance or its apparent purpose or policy." An interpretation of a local code provision to require that in order to be recognized as separately developable, a parcel must have been in separate ownership on a particular date, is not "clearly contrary" to the terms of, or "inconsistent with the express language" or "apparent purpose or policy" of, the code provision. Kishpaugh v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 164 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government interprets a code requirement that all functions associated with a proposed use take place "within the building" proposed to house the use to be satisfied, where a covered play area will be part of the total "floor area" of such building, its interpretation of the code is not inconsistent with the code's express language, purpose or policy and, therefore, must be affirmed. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 98 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local code allows recycling and other incidental uses, LUBA will defer to a local government interpretation of the code as allowing a recycling facility that accepts waste material including both solid waste and recyclable material, where approximately 70 percent of the material accepted will be recycled and approximately 30 percent will be disposed of at a landfill. Linebarger v. City of The Dalles, 24 Or LUBA 91 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. LUBA is not required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own code, where that interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the code. Goose Hollow Foothills League v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 69 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where there is a conflict between (1) plan text describing the geographic location of a Goal 5 forest resource site, and (2) other plan text giving its acreage, resolving that conflict in favor of the geographic location is at least as reasonable as resolving the conflict in favor of the acreage figure, LUBA will defer to the local government's interpretation of its plan. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 23 Or LUBA 565 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where a local government's interpretation of its comprehensive plan Goal 5 inventory is consistent with the plan language and appears to be consistent with the purpose and policy of the plan, LUBA may not reject that interpretation. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 23 Or LUBA 565 (1992).

1.1.3 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Effect of Local Government Interpretation. Where the purposes of a county's commercial zones are to provide for retail-oriented needs in areas characterized by good transportation services, and such needs and services are not identified with a particular proposed golf course, the county's interpretation of its own ordinance that the golf course is not a commercial use is not inconsistent with express language of the local ordinance or the ordinance's apparent purpose or policy and will be affirmed. West v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 558 (1992).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a local code provision requires that a proposed conditional use be "consistent with the character of the area," and where nothing in the code defines or describes the relevant study area for purposes of the provision, a local government does not err by expanding the scope of the study area beyond that described in the application. Tarr v. Multnomah County, 81 Or LUBA 242 (2020).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Approving a boundary line adjustment to a parcel under applicable standards does not "collaterally attack" a previous land partition decision that originally created the subject parcel under different standards, even assuming the adjusted parcel after the boundary line adjustment would not comply with the partition standards that were applied earlier when the parcel was created. Friends of Douglas County v. Douglas County, 78 Or LUBA 11 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. When the county is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1), the decision can be reversed only if the interpretation is inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy underlying the relevant code language. Under a non-deferential standard of review petitioner must demonstrate that the commissioners' interpretation is reversible. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 78 Or LUBA 81 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. When a code provision requires geotechnical analysis, the feasibility of the planned development must be shown at the preliminary plan stage; however, technical matters that require expert evaluation may be deferred to administrative review and final plan approval even when final plan approval does not require a public hearing. Lundeen v. City of Waldport, 78 Or LUBA 95 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. When a county opts to approve a permit without a public hearing, any person who is adversely affected or aggrieved, or who is entitled to notice of the decision may appeal a decision made without a hearing. The county cannot require participation prior to a decision, either by attending a conference (that may or may not have occurred), or providing written comments, or in any other manner. Additionally, the county may not enact additional restrictions to prevent a person who is entitled to file an appeal under the ORS 215.416(11)(a)(A) right to file a local appeal. Hood River Valley Residents Comm. v. Hood River County, 78 Or LUBA 282 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. When a party raises an issue for the first time at oral argument LUBA will ignore all statements made at oral argument, by any party, that go beyond the issues framed in the briefs and the evidence cited in the record, and will confine its review to the issues framed in the briefs, the evidence cited in the record, and the portions of the oral argument that discuss those issues and evidence. See OAR 661-010-0040(1) and ORS 197.835(2)(a). Conte v. City of Eugene, 78 Or LUBA 289 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Pursuant to Gutoski v. Lane County, 155 Or App 369, 963 P2d 145 (1998), where a planning commission initially finds a proposal complies with a planned unit development (PUD) approval standard without requiring transportation improvements, but on remand based on a different evidentiary record finds that some improvements are necessary to ensure compliance with the PUD approval standard, drawing a different conclusion based on a different evidentiary record does not mean that the planning commission changed its interpretation of the PUD approval standard. Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Remand for new proceedings to allow the petitioner to present new evidence to respond to an allegedly new, unanticipated interpretation of an approval standard is not warranted under Gutoski v. Lane County, 155 Or App 369, 963 P2d 145 (1998), where the allegedly new interpretation is consistent with the position for which the petitioner argued and presented supporting evidence during the initial proceedings below. Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where LUBA remands a county's decision adopting an ordinance so that the county can provide the published notice of the board of county commissioners' hearing that ORS 215.060 requires, considering petitioners' arguments directed at the ordinance would be inconsistent with sound principles of judicial review when a different ordinance may be adopted as a result of LUBA's remand. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Clatsop County, 75 Or LUBA 277 (2017).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a petitioner did not raise the issue in its filed statement of appeal before the hearings officer that street tree planting is required only when a new street is created, a planning commission exceeds its authority by considering the issue under the local code provisions governing the scope of appeals to the planning commission. Rockbridge Capital v. City of Eugene, 75 Or LUBA 364 (2017).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a county's land development ordinance provides petitioner with the right to appeal its staff decision to a hearings officer, whether the county's provisions for appealing a planning director decision are permissive or mandatory, they are "remedies" that are "available by right" to petitioner, within the meaning of the ORS 197.825(2)(a) requirement that a petitioner exhaust available local remedies, and therefore LUBA lacks jurisdiction if petitioner did not avail herself of the county's procedures for local appeal. Levy v. Jackson County, 75 Or LUBA 401 (2017).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where LUBA remands a decision for the county to interpret an approval standard in the first instance, the county need not adopt additional findings applying the standard to the application under the new interpretation, where the interpretation adopted on remand is consistent with the county's original findings of compliance, which the county re-adopted on remand. Foland v. Jackson County, 69 Or LUBA 49 (2014).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA will strike documents attached to the petition for review that are offered as "context" for interpreting an administrative rule adopted in 1990, where the documents are not subject to official notice, long post-date the 1990 administrative rule, and could not provide "context" for interpreting the rule. Fritch v. Clackamas County, 68 Or LUBA 184 (2013).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A city's final decision includes adequate findings and a code interpretation adequate for review, where the final decision adopts a planning staff decision as its own, and the planning staff decision embodies a code interpretation that is adequate for review. Sellwood-Moreland Improvement League v. City of Portland, 68 Or LUBA 213 (2013).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a zoning ordinance requires that a notice of local appeal "include" "a clear and distinct identification of the specific grounds" for appeal and that compliance with that requirement is "jurisdictional," a local government may insist on strict compliance with the zoning ordinance requirements of a local notice of appeal. It is not inconsistent with the text of the zoning ordinance to conclude that a local appeal should be dismissed where the notice of intent to appeal includes no grounds for appeal and instead attempts to incorporate by reference legal issues stated in a different document that was created for a different reason, without attaching a copy of that document. Lang v. City of Ashland, 64 Or LUBA 250 (2011).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. For purposes of ORS 197.829, LUBA must recognize as adequate for review a governing body's implicit interpretation of a local approval standard, where the findings and decision carry with it only one possible meaning for the standard and an easily inferred explanation of that meaning. Green v. Douglas County, 245 Or App 430, 263 P3d 355 (2011). Foland v. Jackson County, 64 Or LUBA 265 (2011).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A finding that "public facilities exist that are adequate to serve" proposed development is not sufficient to embody a reviewable interpretation of a plan map amendment standard requiring that "adequate public facilities can be provided to the property," where the findings fail to clarify whether the governing body understands the standard to be concerned only with the existence of public facilities in the area with adequate capacity, or whether the standard is also concerned with whether the public facility provider is willing and able to provide services to the property. Foland v. Jackson County, 64 Or LUBA 265 (2011).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Under ORS 197.829(2), where the local government fails to interpret a local standard or adopt a reviewable interpretation, LUBA may interpret the standard in the first instance or remand the decision for the local government for an interpretation. Where the meaning of the local standard is "far from obvious" and the local government is in a better position than LUBA to clarify the meaning through interpretation of context and legislative history, LUBA should exercise its discretion to remand for an interpretation. Green v. Douglas County, 245 Or App 430, 263 P3d 355 (2011). Foland v. Jackson County, 64 Or LUBA 265 (2011).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Dismissal of a local appeal for failure to comply with an informational requirement like specifying the date of the appealed decision in the local notice of appeal is a sufficiently harsh sanction that a local government may only dismiss the appeal if its code expressly provides that dismissal is the sanction for not complying with the informational requirement. Golden v. City of Silverton, 58 Or LUBA 399 (2009).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A local government is not bound by ORS 215.427 to interpret a local code provision in the manner that it has been interpreted in prior quasi-judicial proceedings on a different application. Greenhalgh v. Columbia County, 54 Or LUBA 626 (2007).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a local appeal deadline is a mandatory standard, and planning staff provides erroneous information to petitioner regarding the local appeal deadline, petitioner's reliance on that information does not excuse petitioner's untimely filing of the local appeal. Jacobsen v. City of Winston, 51 Or LUBA 602 (2006).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A local government does not lose its inherent authority to interpret or reinterpret an ambiguous code provision in a quasi-judicial context when it decides to initiate a legislative code amendment process to resolve the code ambiguity. Bemis v. City of Ashland, 48 Or LUBA 42 (2004).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the applicable area plan specifically allows submittal of a master plan application without the signatures of all owners of the property subject to the application, petitioners cannot collaterally attack that provision when a master plan application is filed, and city's interpretation that the provision in area plan controls over a more general code provision requiring the consent of all owners is supportable under Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Lowery v. City of Keizer, 48 Or LUBA 568 (2005).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. When a petitioner raises an issue concerning a specific comprehensive plan provision, a local government is obligated to explain the extent to which, if any, the provision applies to the decision. Doob v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 147 (2004).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A prerequisite for application of the deferential standard of review under ORS 197.829(1) is, at a minimum, a written decision or document adopted by the governing body that contains an express or implicit interpretation of a local provision that is adequate for review. A city attorney's interpretation of a local provision is not entitled to deference under that standard, even assuming that the city council informally directed the city attorney to apply that interpretation in denying the challenged building permits. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A code provision stating that the planning director "may" issue a clarification of ambiguous code language through a process requiring a hearing is permissive and does not require the director to provide a hearing in evaluating a particular development proposal that happens to involve ambiguous code language. Holtz v. City of Portland, 44 Or LUBA 595 (2003).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A code provision limiting the planning director's interpretative powers, and prohibiting interpretations of the zoning ordinance that find a use not listed in the zone is "substantially similar" to a listed use, does not necessarily limit the board of commissioners' interpretative powers. To the extent it may, the commissioners' interpretation that the proposed use is a listed use is consistent with the code prohibition. Yeager v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 72 (2002).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA will decline to interpret a local provision in the first instance, to determine whether a proposed radio communication tower is a "radio and television transmission and receiving" tower and therefore subject to a special setback, where viewed in context the meaning and apparent purpose of the provision is subject to considerable doubt. Luedtke v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 493 (2002).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA will remand for the county to determine to what extent a code standard imposing a riparian buffer prohibits the removal of native vegetation and whether a proposal for a recreational vehicle camp site within the buffer violates that standard because maintenance of the site requires removal of certain small trees and some native vegetation. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 922 (2000).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. The term "farm use" as defined in ORS 215.203(2)(a) is not a "delegative term," and a county commits no error by failing to adopt county legislation to clarify the meaning in advance of making a decision about whether a particular use qualifies as a "farm use." Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. In determining whether a particular use qualifies as an "other agricultural or horticultural use," as that phrase is used in ORS 215.203(2)(a), there is no requirement that a county hearings officer develop a list of salient characteristics of such uses. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a city code provision grants a city authority to prescribe the "manner" of submitting the "application and related information" but the city has not adopted substantive requirements to implement that authority, the city may not interpret the code provision to deny an application simply because it was signed by the applicant rather than the record title holder. Doumani v. City of Eugene, 35 Or LUBA 388 (1999).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where petitioner alleges a decision violates an ambiguous land use regulation provision, LUBA must first determine whether the decision includes a reviewable interpretation that is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1). Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA is only required to defer to a local government's express or implied interpretation where the interpretation is adequate for review. Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998)

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where an interpretation cannot be implied by the way the code was applied and cannot be implied to resolve an irreconcilable conflict between code provisions, the decision lacks an implied interpretation. Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where there is no express or implied interpretation of an ambiguous local code provision, LUBA may interpret the code in the first instance. Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the purpose of an ambiguous code provision is not clear and the provision is subject to more than one sustainable interpretation, it is appropriate for LUBA to remand the decision to the local government to interpret its land use regulation in the first instance. Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. The local government may be required to reopen the evidentiary hearing where the local government (1) changes to a significant degree an established interpretation of an approval standard; (2) the change makes relevant a different type of evidence that was irrelevant under the old interpretation; and (3) the party seeking to submit evidence responsive to the new interpretation identifies what evidence not already in the record it seeks to submit. Gutoski v. Lane County, 34 Or LUBA 219 (1998).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the inapplicability of a local code provision is clear on its face, or petitioner's challenge to its applicability is so untenable as to obviate the need for the local government's authoritative interpretation, a remand for such purpose is unnecessary. Cummings v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 17 (1996).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a local regulation allows certain development applicants to apply for a waiver of their application fees, no interpretation of that regulation would allow a development opponent to qualify for a waiver of appeal fees, and to remand for such findings would be devoid of substantive purpose. Cummings v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 17 (1996).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A local government's interpretation of its zoning ordinance must be provided in the challenged decision or supporting findings, not in the local government's brief. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. ORS 197.829(2) permits LUBA to determine whether a local government decision is correct, even when local government fails to interpret adequately a provision of its comprehensive plan or land use regulations. East Lancaster Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Salem, 30 Or LUBA 147 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. There is no statutory or administrative law requirement that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings. However, where a challenged legislative land use decision was made by the local governing body and the apparently applicable legal standards at issue on appeal are local comprehensive plan provisions, the interpretation of those provisions must initially be made by the governing body in its decision. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. Portland, 29 Or LUBA 429 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A city's hearing notice is not defective for failure to list certain comprehensive plan provisions when the city makes specific findings that those provisions are not approval criteria. Stevens v. City of Medford, 29 Or LUBA 422 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Although LUBA owes no deference to a hearings officer's interpretation of a local enactment, LUBA may remand a challenged decision in cases where the interpretation at issue is not explained in the findings or differs from an earlier interpretation, in order to give the hearings officer an opportunity to interpret the local enactment in the first instance. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Whether certain persons are "applicants" for destination resort preliminary development plan approval, as defined in the local code, requires an interpretation by the local governing body in the first instance. Skrepetos v. Jackson County, 29 Or LUBA 193 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where determining whether a notice of intent to appeal was timely filed under ORS 197.830(3) depends on determining which code notice of hearing provision applied to the local proceeding, and LUBA can infer from the challenged decision which notice provision the local governing body believes governs the local proceeding and agrees with that interpretation, even without the deference required by Clark, LUBA is not required to remand the decision for the governing body to make its interpretation explicit. Orenco Neighborhood v. City of Hillsboro, 29 Or LUBA 186 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. When reviewing a local governing body's decision, LUBA cannot interpret local enactments in the first instance. Where petitioners challenge a local governing body's decision on the basis of failure to comply with certain arguably applicable comprehensive plan and code provisions, and the challenged decision contains neither an interpretation of the applicability of the plan and code provisions, nor a determination of whether they are satisfied, the challenged decision must be remanded. McCrary v. City of Talent, 29 Or LUBA 110 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Without a demonstration that the interpretation of a local code provision in the challenged decision is significantly different from a previously established local government interpretation of that provision, petitioners fail to establish the local government erred by announcing the disputed interpretation for the first time in its final decision. Wicks v. City of Reedsport, 29 Or LUBA 8

(1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the challenged decision was adopted by a decision maker other than the local governing body, and the decision fails to contain an interpretation of relevant code provisions, LUBA may interpret the local code. Beveled Edge Machines, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 28 Or LUBA 790 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. In reviewing a decision adopted by a local governing body, LUBA must review the governing body's interpretation of local code provisions and may not interpret the local code in the first instance, unless there is "no possible rational dispute" regarding the correct interpretation. Champion v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 618 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. In reviewing a decision adopted by the local governing body, LUBA must review the governing body's interpretation of local code provisions and may not interpret the local code in the first instance, unless there is "no possible rational dispute" regarding the correct interpretation of the local code. Foster v. Coos County, 28 Or LUBA 609 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the challenged decision is adopted by the governing body, LUBA must grant considerable deference to the governing body's interpretations of the local code and cannot interpret the local code in the first instance. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. The question of whether the governing body erroneously accepted a local appeal turns on the interpretation of relevant provisions of the city's code. Because LUBA may not interpret the local code in the first instance when reviewing a decision by a governing body, the decision must be remanded for such an interpretation. Shapiro v. City of Talent, 28 Or LUBA 542 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. To determine whether a use is a motel under the local code, a local government does not err in examining the original prospectus for the use. Kaady v. City of Cannon Beach, 28 Or LUBA 509 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the challenged decision is made by a governing body and does not explain whether or to what extent apparently applicable comprehensive plan standards apply to the proposal, the challenged decision must be remanded for such an explanation. Lamm v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 468 (1995).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the challenged decision is adopted by the governing body, LUBA may not interpret the applicability of arguably applicable comprehensive plan policies. Rather, the governing body must interpret the applicability of such plan policies in the first instance. Welch v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 439 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a comprehensive plan provision potentially applies to a proposal, and a governing body's decision is silent concerning the applicability of such a plan provision, the challenged decision must be remanded for the governing body to interpret the plan provision. Neuman v. City of Albany, 28 Or LUBA 337 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the local code provides for discretionary review of certain development applications by the planning director, and also provides a process for the planning director to refer questions concerning code interpretation to the governing body, the code does not divest the planning director of authority to interpret the code in carrying out his duties. Knee Deep Cattle Company v. Lane County, 28 Or LUBA 288 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA is not required to remand a decision for a local government to interpret its comprehensive plan in the first instance unless petitioners offer some explanation for why they believe the plan provision the local government failed to address in its decision applies in the circumstances presented in the appeal. Holsheimer v. Columbia County, 28 Or LUBA 279 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a local governing body's findings are unclear with regard to whether the local government interprets the provisions of the local code's unstable slopes overlay district as applicable to approval of a subdivision preliminary plat, the challenged decision does not contain an interpretation adequate for review and must be remanded. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 28 Or LUBA 263 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a challenged city council decision approving the provision of city sewer and water services outside city limits does not interpret arguably relevant comprehensive plan provisions with regard to whether they are approval criteria for the challenged decision, LUBA must remand the decision to the city to adopt such interpretations, before LUBA can determine whether the challenged decision is a land use decision subject to LUBA review. Fraser v. City of Joseph, 28 Or LUBA 217 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. If a city council decision approving a subdivision does not explain how the city interprets relevant comprehensive plan and code provisions to allow a 40-foot street right-of-way, the decision must be remanded for the city council to interpret the local provisions in the first instance. Woodstock Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 146 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A hearings officer's reliance on a dictionary definition of "in conjunction with" without providing the dictionary definition relied upon is harmless error, where it is apparent from the decision that the hearings officer interpreted the code term to require establishment of a customer/seller or seller/customer relationship between the proposed commercial use and timber and farm uses in the community. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where one of the local government's critical findings depends on the scope of the term "houseboat," and the term is not defined in the local code or in the challenged decision, the decision must be remanded for the local government to supply the needed explanation of the scope of the term. Cole v. Columbia County, 28 Or LUBA 62 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Even if a local code provision requiring that six percent of the gross area of a proposed subdivision be dedicated for open space is properly interpreted as a minimum rather than a maximum requirement, a decision requiring dedication of much more than six percent of the gross area of a proposed subdivision must be remanded so that the local government may adopt findings explaining that interpretation and showing the "rough proportionality" requirement of Dolan v. City of Tigard is satisfied. Davis v. City of Bandon, 28 Or LUBA 38 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a challenged decision determines certain comprehensive plan policies are mandatory approval standards applicable to the proposed action, but LUBA cannot determine from the decision what the local government believes those policies require, the decision must be remanded for the local government to interpret the policies. Beck v. City of Happy Valley, 27 Or LUBA 631 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a challenged decision adopts a new plan policy stating the city will allow a particular commercial-designated area to be developed "to serve both neighborhood commercial needs and as a community commercial center," but declines to change a plan policy that commercial development of the area should be at an intensity consistent with General Office or Neighborhood Commercial zoning, LUBA will remand the decision for the city to interpret the relevant plan and code provisions in the first instance. Graville Properties, Ltd. v. City of Eugene, 27 Or LUBA 583 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where petitioners contend legislative land use regulation amendments are inconsistent with certain arguably relevant comprehensive plan provisions, and those plan provisions are not interpreted in the challenged decision, LUBA must remand the challenged decision for the local government to adopt the necessary plan interpretations as part of its decision. Redland/Viola/Fischer's Mill CPO v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 560 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. If the local government interpretation of an applicable comprehensive plan provision expressed in a challenged decision is unclear, such that LUBA cannot determine whether the findings supporting the decision are adequate to demonstrate compliance with that plan provision, LUBA will remand the decision to the local government to clarify its interpretation. Furler v. Curry County, 27 Or LUBA 546 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where petitioner contends the challenged decision fails to address a comprehensive plan provision that appears to contain a standard applicable to the proposal, the local government must explain in its decision why the plan provision either is inapplicable to the proposal or is satisfied by the proposal. LUBA may not make such determinations in the first instance. Laine v. City of Rockaway Beach, 27 Or LUBA 493 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a challenged decision incorrectly concludes arguments based on an arguably applicable comprehensive plan provision are precluded by the acknowledgment of an earlier decision, and does not interpret that plan provision, LUBA must remand the decision for the local government to interpret the plan provision in the first instance. Rea v. City of Seaside, 27 Or LUBA 443 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA lacks authority to interpret local comprehensive plan provisions in the first instance. Where certain comprehensive plan policies are arguably applicable to a development application and the challenged decision approving or denying that application does not include an interpretation of those policies, LUBA must remand the decision so the local government can interpret and apply its plan policies. Barrick v. City of Salem, 27 Or LUBA 417 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a local government relies on conditions to ensure that use of an approved parking structure is limited to "short term parking," as required by its code, any interpretations of code provisions necessary to support its determination that the code limitation to "short term parking" is satisfied must be set out in the challenged decision or supporting findings, not in the local government's brief. BCT Partnership v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 278 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. If petitioners contend the challenged decision fails to demonstrate compliance with certain local comprehensive plan and code provisions that are not addressed in the challenged decision, and those provisions are capable of being interpreted as approval standards under the permissive scope of review standard of ORS 197.829, LUBA must remand the decision to the local government to interpret and apply the plan and code provisions in the first instance. Dorgan v. City of Albany, 27 Or LUBA 64 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where an exclusive farm use zone does not allow asphalt batch plants or their accessory uses, and petitioner contends the county erred by permitting a private access road across exclusive farm used zoned property to serve an asphalt batch plant, the county must respond in its decision to that interpretive question. Where the county fails to do so and simply concludes such roads are allowable, the decision must be remanded so that the county can adopt an interpretive response adequate for LUBA review. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA is not required to remand a decision for a local government interpretation of its code, where the interpretive issue raised by petitioner is so untenable that LUBA can reject it without an authoritative determination by the local decision maker. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where "private school" is listed as a conditional use in a particular zone, but the challenged decision does not interpret the code definitions of "private school" and "commercial school," or explain why application of those definitions to the facts leads to the conclusion that the proposed school is a "private school," LUBA must remand the challenged decision to the county to adopt the required interpretation in the first instance. Eppich v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 498 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a local code provision implementing ORS 215.283(1)(a) lists schools "including all buildings essential to the operation of a school" as a conditional use in an EFU zone, and the local government fails to interpret and apply the quoted provision in approving a conditional use permit for a school, LUBA must remand the decision for the local government to interpret its code provision in the first instance. Eppich v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 498 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where petitioners contend the challenged decision does not demonstrate compliance with an applicable approval standard, and the decision does not interpret the standard sufficiently for LUBA to review that interpretation and consider petitioners' arguments, LUBA will remand the decision to the local government. Bottum v. Union County, 26 Or LUBA 407 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Even though LUBA might agree with a county's argument in its brief that the purpose section of its EFU zoning district is not an approval standard for a farm dwelling permit application, if the challenged decision itself does not interpret the code provision, LUBA must remand the decision for the county to interpret the provision in the first instance. Testa v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 357 (1994).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where property is annexed and it is not clear whether a plan policy and implementing measure governing annexations applies in the particular circumstances, a remand is required so that the local government may either apply the plan policy and implementing measure or explain why it does not apply. Sorte v. City of Newport, 26 Or LUBA 236 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where the challenged decision fails to explain whether an arguably relevant comprehensive plan provision imposes limitations on the kinds of uses allowed in the applicable zone, LUBA must remand the decision for such an interpretation. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 26 Or LUBA 181 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where petitioners raised an issue below concerning whether a particular code provision is an applicable approval standard, and the challenged decision contains no interpretation explaining that code provision is either inapplicable or satisfied, LUBA must remand the challenged decision. Hixson v. Josephine County, 26 Or LUBA 159 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a question of proper interpretation of a comprehensive plan provision is raised during local proceedings, the interpretation required for LUBA review of the decision on appeal must be provided in the decision. The local government may not supply the interpretation in its brief on appeal. Eskandarian v. City of Portland, 26 Or LUBA 98 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. A local government decision that makes a binding interpretation of its regulations, without amending or adopting regulation provisions or granting or denying a development application, is a "final" decision, even if other actions are required to give that decision practical effect. City of Grants Pass v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 722 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. The fact that a challenged local government decision does not include an interpretation of a particular local code provision, alleged to be applicable by petitioners, does not provide a basis for reversal or remand if the code provision in question is not ambiguous or susceptible to different sustainable interpretations. Gage v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 449 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA is limited to considering the interpretations of ambiguous code language that are adopted by the decision-making body and may not consider interpretations that are not adopted by the decision maker, even if the offered interpretation is reasonable. Miller v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. LUBA is required to defer to a local government's interpretation of its own ordinances, unless that interpretation is contrary to the express words, policy or context of the local enactment. LUBA may not interpret a local government's ordinances in the first instance, but rather must review the local government's interpretation of its ordinances. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a relevant ordinance provision is capable of more than one meaning, the challenged decision does not expressly interpret the ordinance provision, and LUBA cannot infer the local government's interpretation from the decision, LUBA must remand the decision for the local government to interpret the provision in the first instance. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where LUBA must determine whether an ambiguous code provision (i.e., one that is capable of more than one sustainable interpretation) is applicable to a challenged decision, and the challenged decision does not contain a reviewable interpretation of that provision, LUBA must remand the decision for the local government to interpret the provision in the first instance. Terra v. City of Newport, 24 Or LUBA 438 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where petitioners contend a local government erred in failing to apply a code provision to the challenged decision, and the decision contains no interpretation of that code provision, but the code language unambiguously establishes that the provision in question is not applicable to the challenged decision, LUBA is not required to remand the decision so the local government can interpret its code in the first instance. Terra v. City of Newport, 24 Or LUBA 438 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. That a local governing body ultimately adopts an interpretation of an applicable code standard that is different from that adopted by the hearings officer, and declines to reopen the evidentiary record, does not provide a basis for reversal or remand where (1) there was no "established" local interpretation of the code standard, (2) the governing body's interpretation does not make relevant any new type of evidence, and (3) petitioner does not identify any evidence it wishes to submit if the evidentiary hearing is reopened. Heceta Water District v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 402 (1993).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. Where a county plan policy provides that a particular zone change requires that "parcels are generally five acres," and the county's decision simply states that a total of 58.8 percent of the parcels in the relevant area being five acres or less does not satisfy this plan policy, the decision does not interpret what the policy requires, and LUBA will remand the decision so the county can interpret its plan in the first instance. Thatcher v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 207 (1992).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. It is a local government's responsibility to interpret the terms of its own enactments in the first instance. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 98 (1992).

1.1.4 Administrative Law – Interpretation of Law – Procedural Requirements. It is the local government which, in the first instance, should interpret its own enactments. Where a local government has not interpreted and applied applicable provisions of its code, and it is not clear how those code provisions apply to the subject application, LUBA will remand the challenged decision so that the local government may do so. Gage v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 47 (1992).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Local governments are not required to condition approvals rather than deny noncompliant applications. H2D2 Properties, LLC v. Deschutes County, 80 Or LUBA 528 (2019).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. When the county is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1), the decision can be reversed only if the interpretation is inconsistent with the express language, purpose or policy underlying the relevant code language. Under a non-deferential standard of review petitioner must demonstrate that the commissioners' interpretation is reversible. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 78 Or LUBA 81 (2018).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. When LUBA has affirmed at least one valid basis for denial the Board typically does not address challenges directed at other, alternate, bases for denial. Such an action would result in rendering what are essentially advisory adjudications, which is not consistent with the statutory mandate that LUBA's review should be conducted pursuant to sound principles of judicial review. ORS 197.805. Yamhill Creek Solar, LLC v. Yamhill County, 78 Or LUBA 245 (2018).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. A local government in denying an application for permit approval is not obligated to give the applicant a detailed roadmap that guarantees permit approval. However, under Commonwealth Properties v. Washington County, 35 Or App 387, 400, 582 P2d 1384 (1978), a local government must give the permit applicant some minimal idea of changes that might lead to permit approval. J. Conser and Sons, LLC v. City of Millersburg, 73 Or LUBA 57 (2016).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Where the evidence is extremely one-sided in favor of a permit applicant challenging a county decision denying its application for permit approval for a natural gas pipeline on the basis that other uses allowed in the zone would be limited, it is possible to conclude that the permit applicant challenging the denial on evidentiary grounds carried its burden as a matter of law, as it must when challenging a permit denial on evidentiary grounds. But where that evidence is somewhat equivocal about whether some uses would be limited and does not address whether other uses would be limited, the evidentiary record is insufficient to demonstrate that the permit applicant carried its burden as a matter of law. Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. LUBA typically affirms a decision denying an application for land use approval as long as there is one valid basis for denial, notwithstanding other invalid bases for denial. However, LUBA will remand a county governing body's decision that reverses a planning commission approval of a conditional use, where the only valid basis for denial is a correctable findings and evidentiary deficiency, and the governing body's choice to reverse the planning commission decision rather than remand was based on the governing body's erroneous conclusion that the proposed conditional use is prohibited as a matter of law. In that circumstance, LUBA will remand the decision for the governing body to consider whether the planning commission decision should be remanded rather than reversed. Hood River Valley PRD v. Hood River County, 67 Or LUBA 314 (2013).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Where the local government denies an application based on its conclusion that an applicant did not provide sufficient information, and the applicant submitted detailed information and studies regarding impacts to water quality, water flow, land stability and erosion, the findings are inadequate where they do not explain why the information that was submitted was not "sufficient." Tidewater Contractors v. Curry County, 65 Or LUBA 424 (2012).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. In considering an application for a three-parcel partition, the failure of an existing intersection that is not adjacent to the property to satisfy local zoning ordinance standards that apply to the design and construction of a new road or intersection does not provide a basis for the county to deny an application for a partition, where no new roads or intersections are proposed as part of the partition. Pelz v. Clackamas County, 59 Or LUBA 219 (2009).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Where a local government denies an application based on one approval criterion, and LUBA remands the decision in part for the local government to consider whether additional approval standards apply, it is possible that in determining that additional approval standards apply the local government could identify additional bases for denial under the additional criteria, even if such additional bases for denial were not cited in the original decision. Easterly v. Polk County, 59 Or LUBA 417 (2009).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Remand is necessary where a hearings officer misunderstood the applicant's argument regarding a critical piece of evidence, that misunderstanding played a significant role in denying the application, and LUBA cannot determine if the hearings officer's misunderstanding was harmless error. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Gresham, 54 Or LUBA 16 (2007).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. A hearings officer does not err in concluding that even though a 1975 partition created a unit of land, that unit of land is not a "legal lot" as that term is defined in the county's code, where that unit of land did not conform to the applicable lot dimension standards when it was created. Hogrefe v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 514 (2007).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Absent local code provisions that prohibit re-submittal of denied land use applications, nothing prohibits an applicant from re-submitting, or the local government from accepting, a previously denied application supported by the same or additional evidence. Gordon v. Polk County, 50 Or LUBA 502 (2005).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Assuming, without deciding, that an applicant's misrepresentation of a material fact in a discretionary permit proceeding would allow a local government to deny subsequent administrative permits necessary to carry out the earlier permit approval, the record supporting denial must establish that the applicant indeed misrepresented a material fact. Safeway, Inc. v. City of North Bend, 47 Or LUBA 489 (2004).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Where a city attorney denies four applications for "billboards" on the grounds that "billboards" are not among the types of signs allowed under the city's sign ordinance, it is reasonably clear that the basis for denial is the fact that the applicant proposed a type of sign not allowed by the city's code. The city's post-hoc explanation that the basis for denial was actually the size of the proposed signs is not credible, where the challenged decision contains no hint that size was a consideration. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. LUBA will remand a city decision denying a partition application where it is not clear what documents make up the local decision and the documents that are identified as containing the final land use decision do not set out the city's rationale for denying the application. Martin v. City of Dunes City, 43 Or LUBA 354 (2002).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. A city's decision violates ORS 227.173(1) where the city relies on "factors" or "considerations" that are unconnected to approval standards established in its land use regulations to deny a permit application. Ashley Manor Care Centers v. City of Grants Pass, 38 Or LUBA 308 (2000).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Evidence that industrial uses are occurring on industrially zoned property within two miles of the subject property is insufficient to demonstrate, as a matter of law, that a proposed excavation business located in a rural residential zone complies with a requirement that the use "will not interfere with existing uses on nearby land or with other used permitted in the zone in which the property is located." Munn v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 621 (2000).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. In determining whether a denial is supported by substantial evidence, LUBA considers all relevant evidence, including that which supports and that which detracts from the county's decision. Evenson v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 251 (1999).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. To successfully challenge the evidentiary basis for denial, it is not sufficient for petitioner to show there is evidence in the record to support his position; petitioner must show the evidence is such that a reasonable trier of fact could only decide in his favor. Where the record contains credible, conflicting evidence, petitioner has not sustained his burden to show, as a matter of law, that the trier of fact should only have believed petitioner's evidence. Evenson v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 251 (1999).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Typically only one adequate basis for denial of a land use permit is required to sustain the decision on appeal to LUBA. However, where the approval criteria provide that a setback exception can be granted if any one of several alternative criteria are met and LUBA rejects the hearings officer's findings of noncompliance with two of those alternative criteria, a remand is appropriate. Parsley v. Jackson County, 34 Or LUBA 540 (1998).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. While it is the applicants' burden to demonstrate compliance with relevant approval criteria, if a local government determines an approval criterion is not satisfied, it must adopt findings explaining why it believes the applicants failed to meet this burden. Neuman v. Benton County, 29 Or LUBA 172 (1995).

1.2.1 Administrative Law – Denials – Generally. Local government denial of proposed partitions because the ability of the school district to provide the level of school services required by certain plan policies has not been established does not constitute the imposition of a development moratorium prohibited by ORS 195.110(8). Beck v. City of Happy Valley, 27 Or LUBA 631 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. When LUBA has affirmed at least one valid basis for denial the Board typically does not address challenges directed at other, alternate, bases for denial. Such an action would result in rendering what are essentially advisory adjudications, which is not consistent with the statutory mandate that LUBA's review should be conducted pursuant to sound principles of judicial review. ORS 197.805. Yamhill Creek Solar, LLC v. Yamhill County, 78 Or LUBA 245 (2018).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. To succeed in a motion to take evidence outside the record and pursuant to OAR 661-010-0045(1), and (2)(a) and (c), regarding an alleged violation of petitioners' rights under the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, the movant must develop a legal theory and a set of factual assertions sufficient to allow LUBA to determine how consideration of the proffered evidence would "affect the outcome of the review proceeding." Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. In a motion to take evidence outside the record pursuant to OAR 661-010-0045(1), and (2)(a) and (c), petitioners' argument—that two city employees violated petitioners' rights under the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution because the employees engaged in the "unequal" application of the applicable standards in processing two similarly situated planned unit development (PUD) projects—fails to demonstrate that the proffered evidence would concern "procedural irregularities not shown in the record and which, if proved, would warrant reversal or remand of the decision" because petitioners do not allege that the final decision maker violated petitioners' constitutional rights. Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where intervenor applied for, and received, two consecutive land use compatibility statements (LUCS), and argues it has now abandoned any reliance on the first LUCS decision, and instead has chosen to proceed with development pursuant to the second LUCS decision, the intervenor's current intent does not necessarily render the first LUCS decision ineffective. Unless and until the local government takes action to withdraw, revoke, or supersede the first LUCS decision, it remains as a potential basis for intervenor to proceed with development based on the LUCS as a final and binding county decision, and is therefore not moot. Bishop v. Deschutes County, 76 Or LUBA 515 (2017).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. A decision by the city that it will not approve any road that is located in the conceptual location approved in a previously approved conceptual development plan, and that is also shown in the city's adopted transportation systems plan and the adopted area refinement plan for the city, would not be a land use decision that is "in compliance with the acknowledged plan and land use regulations." ORS 197.175(2)(d). GPA 1 LLC v. City of Corvallis, 74 Or LUBA 527 (2016).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where a road is proposed in the conceptual location approved in a previously approved conceptual development plan, and is also shown in the city's adopted transportation systems plan and the adopted area refinement plan for the city, the city has a heightened obligation under Commonwealth Properties v. Washington County, 35 Or App 387, 400, 582 P2d 1384 (1978), to either (1) approve the proposed alignment that is consistent with the planned and approved location, or (2) make it very clear which of five other alternative proposed alignments the city will accept. GPA 1 LLC v. City of Corvallis, 74 Or LUBA 527 (2016).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. If a local government interprets its code to the effect that federal particulate matter standards supply the relevant test for compliance with local approval standards, articulates that interpretation for the first time in its final decision, and denies the application for failure to present evidence of compliance with the federal standards, remand would likely be necessary to give the applicant an opportunity to present evidence addressing the federal standards. However, remand is not warranted where the decision merely discusses federal standards, but ultimately concludes that those standards do not govern. Easterly v. Polk County, 59 Or LUBA 417 (2009).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Findings to explain the basis for denial of a permit are inadequate where the findings do not explain which criteria the application fails to meet or otherwise inform the applicant what steps are necessary to obtain approval under the relevant criteria. Bridge Street Partners v. City of Lafayette, 56 Or LUBA 387 (2008).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Under a variance standard requiring that the "hardship" not be "self-created," a finding that the "applicant's desire to partition his property" created the "hardship" is an insufficient basis to deny the variance request, where the hardship is the lack of alternative access to the proposed parcel and there is no explanation in the findings how petitioner's desire to partition his property created the lack of alternative access to the proposed parcel. Krishchenko v. City of Canby, 52 Or LUBA 290 (2006).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. The conclusory nature of a finding that faults the applicant for failing to present any evidence or evaluation of adverse impacts does not provide a basis for remand, where the hearings officer interpreted the code to require at least some evidence or evaluation of adverse impacts, and the applicant provided none. Wiper v. City of Eugene, 47 Or LUBA 21 (2004).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Assuming ORS 197.522 is applicable outside the moratoria context, that statute does not require a local government to develop on its own conditions of approval that would render proposed development compliant with applicable criteria, as an alternative to denial. Rather, the initial burden of proposing conditions to make development consistent with applicable criteria belongs to the applicant. Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. ORS 197.522 does not require a local government to reopen the record after reaching a tentative decision to deny a development application, to allow the applicant an opportunity to propose conditions that would allow approval. Rather, the applicant must propose such conditions during the evidentiary proceedings or in making final legal arguments to address concerns raised during the proceedings and ensure compliance with applicable criteria. Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where a city attorney denies four applications for "billboards" on the grounds that "billboards" are not among the types of signs allowed under the city's sign ordinance, it is reasonably clear that the basis for denial is the fact that the applicant proposed a type of sign not allowed by the city's code. The city's post-hoc explanation that the basis for denial was actually the size of the proposed signs is not credible, where the challenged decision contains no hint that size was a consideration. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. When an applicant asserts below that it is entitled to a well under the statutory exemption to obtaining a water use permit pursuant to ORS 537.545 and the findings supporting denial on the basis of lack of a water source do not address or respond to that assertion, the findings are inadequate. Molalla River Reserve, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 251 (2002).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. When the applicant and the local government address approval criteria using different approaches, findings denying the application must provide an explanation for why the applicant's approach is inadequate and explain, in at least a general way, how the applicant must address the criteria under the local government's approach. Molalla River Reserve, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 251 (2002).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. LUBA will remand a decision denying an application to place and remove fill in a riparian zone, where the findings do not independently address the relevant standards and it is not clear what evidence the hearings officer relied on to apply the standards. Griffin v. Jackson County, 41 Or LUBA 159 (2001).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where the applicant presents argument and evidence that property designated and zoned for forest use is not in fact forest land protected by Goal 4, making an exception to that goal unnecessary to rezone the property for residential use, the county errs in denying the rezoning application without addressing the issue or explaining why it believes the subject property is protected by Goal 4. Potts v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 371 (2001).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. In denying an application for land use approval based on a finding that the application does not comply with applicable criteria, a local government must explain in its findings why it believes the applicable criteria are not satisfied. Further, the local government's findings must be sufficient to inform petitioner either what steps are necessary to obtain approval or that it is unlikely that the application will be approved. Rogue Valley Manor v. City of Medford, 38 Or LUBA 266 (2000).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where a local government finds noncompliance with an approval criterion because an intersection outside the traffic study area is inadequate to serve the subject property, but it is not clear why the local government believes the intersection "serves" the property, LUBA will remand to allow the local government to provide a more adequate interpretation of the criterion. Ontrack, Inc. v. City of Medford, 37 Or LUBA 472 (2000).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. A county's finding that a proposed nonforest dwelling is inconsistent with forest uses is inadequate where the finding is so conclusory that it fails to inform the applicant either what steps are necessary to obtain approval or that it is unlikely that the application can be approved. Eddings v. Columbia County, 36 Or LUBA 159 (1999).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Even though a city's denial of a land use application need only include findings adequate to demonstrate that one applicable criterion is not satisfied, before the city can reach such a conclusion it must first explain the applicable criteria, state the facts the city relied upon in reaching the decision and justify the decision based upon the criteria and facts. Boehm v. City of Shady Cove, 31 Or LUBA 85 (1996).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. While findings of noncompliance with applicable criteria need not be exhaustive, they must at least either inform the applicant of the standards the application does not meet or of the steps necessary to satisfy the standards. Boehm v. City of Shady Cove, 31 Or LUBA 85 (1996).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. ORS 227.173(2) does not require a local government to make findings regarding criteria which could support approval of an application, or to make findings regarding criteria upon which it did not rely in reaching its decision to deny an application. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 30 Or LUBA 85 (1995).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. When a challenged decision denies development approval, the county need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one approval standard is not met. Sandgren v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 454 (1995).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. To support denial of a land use permit, a local government need only establish the existence of one adequate basis for denial. Horizon Construction, Inc. v. City of Newberg, 28 Or LUBA 632 (1995).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where the challenged decision is one to deny a development proposal, a local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. Duck Delivery Produce v. Deschutes County, 28 Or LUBA 614 (1995).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where the challenged decision denying development approval fails to inform the applicant of the steps it must take to gain approval of its application or, alternatively, of the standards the application does not meet, the decision must be remanded. Ellis v. City of Bend, 28 Or LUBA 332 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where the challenged decision is one to deny proposed development, LUBA must sustain the decision if there are adequate findings, supported by substantial evidence in the record, determining that one applicable standard is not met. Newsome v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 578 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where an approval standard for partitioning timber zoned property into nonresource parcels requires that the subject property be "generally unsuitable land for the production of farm or forest products," and petitioner does not challenge a county determination that the subject property is generally suitable for farm use, that determination provides an independent basis for affirming the county's decision to deny the partition. Newsome v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 578 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Only one sustainable basis for a decision to deny a conditional use permit is required. Where such a sustainable basis for denial exists, LUBA does not consider challenges to other unrelated aspects of the decision. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 27 Or LUBA 453 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Only one sustainable basis for a decision to deny a request for land use approval is required. Salem-Keizer School Dist. 24-J v. City of Salem, 27 Or LUBA 351 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. While it may be that findings of noncompliance with a relevant approval standard need not be as exhaustive or detailed as those necessary to establish compliance with that approval standard, a local government is obligated to provide an explanation for its conclusion that the standard is not met. Salem-Keizer School Dist. 24-J v. City of Salem, 27 Or LUBA 351 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where a code approval standard prohibits the proposed use unless an exception is justified under a second code standard that requires the local government to have a "short term parking strategy," if the local government has not adopted a "short term parking strategy," it cannot make use of the exception provided by the second standard and must deny the application. BCT Partnership v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 278 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Although a local government may impose conditions and rely on such conditions to determine a development application meets applicable approval standards, there is no general requirement that a local government must apply conditions to modify a proposal so that applicable standards are met, rather than deny the application. Shelter Resources, Inc. v. City of Cannon Beach, 27 Or LUBA 229 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where a local government denies a request to remove a condition placed on a previous land use approval, based on its determination that neither of two sets of circumstances giving rise to the condition has changed, and petitioner challenges the local government's determination concerning only one set of circumstances, LUBA will affirm the local government's decision. Livingston v. Jackson County, 26 Or LUBA 395 (1994).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. To support a denial, a local government need only establish the existence of one adequate basis for denial. Kangas v. City of Oregon City, 26 Or LUBA 177 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Because an applicant for development approval bears the burden of proof in a local government proceeding, if the challenged local government's decision denies petitioner's request for zoning clearance, only one sustainable basis for the decision is required. McPeek v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 165 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. To support denial of a development application, a local government need only establish the existence of one adequate basis for denial. Hahn v. Marion County, 26 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Because a permit applicant has the burden of demonstrating compliance with each approval criterion, a single supported finding of noncompliance with an approval criterion is sufficient to support a decision denying the permit. Ball and Associates v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 525 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. For LUBA to sustain a challenged decision to deny proposed development, the local government need only adopt findings supported by substantial evidence that the proposal fails to meet one applicable standard. Oregon Raptor Center v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 401 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. While a local government is free to impose conditions to enable it to approve a development application, it is not required to do so and may instead choose to deny development that, as proposed, does not satisfy relevant standards. Decuman v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. For LUBA to sustain a local government's denial decision, LUBA must find that the local government adopted findings supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more applicable standards are not met. Decuman v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. To support a denial decision, a local government need only establish the existence of one adequate basis for denial. Roozenboom v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 433 (1993).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where the challenged decision is one to deny proposed development, the local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that at least one standard is not satisfied. Stockwell v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 358 (1992).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Where the challenged decision denies a proposed development, the local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. Further, in challenging a denial decision on evidentiary grounds, petitioners have the burden of establishing compliance with each and every criterion as a matter of law. Woosley v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 231 (1992).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. To support a decision denying proposed development, local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. Leopold v. City of Milwaukie, 24 Or LUBA 246 (1992).

1.2.2 Administrative Law – Denials – Requirements for. Inadequate findings concerning one of the bases for denying a permit application provide no basis for reversal or remand where there are other adequate findings of noncompliance with applicable approval standards. Reeder v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 583 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a local code provision allows a reduced setback where "the required setback would prohibit the placement of the residential structure on the parcel due to topography," and where the decision-maker denied a reduced setback in part because they concluded that there was a buildable area within the setback envelope that did not contain steep slopes, even if LUBA agrees with the petitioners that credible evidence weighs overwhelmingly in favor of a finding that the entire setback envelope contains steep slopes, LUBA must affirm the denial where the petitioners fail to challenge the decision-maker's further conclusion that steep slopes do not prohibit development but, instead, require further assessment, and where the petitioners did not provide any expert assessment that the entire setback envelope was unbuildable due to steep slopes. Velasquez v. Jackson County, 80 Or LUBA 1 (2019).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a local government adopts independent findings and applies a different substantive analysis for two separate approval criteria, but relies on the same evidence in concluding that those criteria are not met, a petitioner does not effectively challenge the findings for one of those criteria by challenging the findings for the other so as to defeat an argument that it has failed to challenge all valid, alternative, and independent bases for denial. Himmelberger v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 367 (2019).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. OAR 660-012-0035(4) requires local governments to design their transportation system plans to achieve adopted standards for reducing reliance on cars. Although a city errs in finding that OAR 660-012-0035(4) does not apply to specific projects or to targeted amendments to a transportation system plan (TSP), where the findings also (1) identify adopted standards within the city's TSP, the city's comprehensive plan, and revised code that include measures to reduce reliance on cars, and (2) additionally conclude that the amendments comply with OAR 660-012-0035(4), and petitioner neither challenges those findings nor identifies any adopted standards in the TSP, comprehensive plan or revised code that the TSP amendments fail to satisfy, petitioners' arguments provide no basis for reversal or remand. Deumling v. City of Salem, 76 Or LUBA 99 (2017).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where petitioners argue that the city's calculation of future travel demand that relies on projections in the adopted and acknowledged regional transportation analysis prepared by state, regional and local governments is not supported by substantial evidence and petitioners fail to point to any evidence that contradicts or undercuts the city's traffic models based on the regional transportation analysis, petitioners have failed to set forth a basis for remand or reversal. Deumling v. City of Salem, 76 Or LUBA 99 (2017).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. A hearings officer's decision relying upon intervenor's traffic study is supported by substantial evidence where the hearings officer addressed petitioner's challenges to the credibility of the traffic study by citing to testimony of the intervenor's traffic engineer responding to each of petitioner's challenges. Willis v. Clackamas County, 76 Or LUBA 244 (2017).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In applying a development code standard that authorizes a local government to approve exceptions to lot size standards for planned developments if the development's "design and amenities" warrant the exceptions, the fact that preservation of open space is encouraged by the comprehensive plan does not mean the exceptions must be approved simply because the proposal would preserve open space. That the proposed open space is consistent with the comprehensive plan does not require approval of the requested exceptions. J. Conser and Sons, LLC v. City of Millersburg, 73 Or LUBA 57 (2016).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. When a local ordinance requires that no additional vehicle trips enter an intersection during peak hours, an applicant cannot overcome a denial by merely encouraging visitors to use other routes to the site. Without an enforcement mechanism or evidence that such encouragement would be completely effective without an enforcement mechanism, the applicant has not demonstrated as a matter of law that no additional vehicle trips would enter the intersection during peak hours. Vista Construction, LLC v. City of Grants Pass, 59 Or LUBA 195 (2009).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a hearings officer's evaluation of the evidence is based in part on a considered assessment that one set of witnesses is more credible or reliable than others with respect to a disputed factual issue, it will be a rare circumstance where LUBA has a basis to overturn that credibility judgment. Applebee v. Washington County, 54 Or LUBA 364 (2007).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. The burden of overturning a permit denial on evidentiary grounds is even more difficult when the applicable approval criteria are highly subjective in nature, such as standards requiring "adequate" transportation improvements to "promote safety" and "reduce congestion." Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Given the subjectivity of criteria requiring that (1) the subject property be of adequate size to allow for "aesthetic design treatment," (2) the proposed building be "compatible" in scale and mass with adjoining structures, and (3) the site plan provide for "adequate" buffers, the testimony of residential neighbors that a proposed church on a 3.85-acre parcel fails to comply with these criteria is adequate to support the city's finding of noncompliance. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Conclusory testimony by an acoustic engineer that a proposed church will not violate "maximum allowable noise levels" is insufficient to show compliance as a matter of law with code standards that require a demonstration that proposed uses will not exceed specific decibel levels within a specified distance from adjoining residential uses. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Petitioner fails to overcome the county's determination that property is forest land under Goal 4, and fails to demonstrate as a matter of law that land is not "suitable for commercial forest uses," where petitioner's own expert testifies that notwithstanding limitations on productivity the subject property is in a "medium productivity range" and would yield $81,300 worth of commercial timber at 50 years, after an investment of $7,450. Potts v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 1 (2002).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where there is evidence in the record to show that limited farm and forest activities may be conducted on the subject property, petitioner has not met his burden in challenging a denial on evidentiary grounds to show that, as a matter of law, only his evidence regarding the practicability of farm and forest use may be believed. Dhillon v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 397 (2001).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where there is conflicting substantial evidence regarding the location of a property line, and the local government determines, as a result, that the applicants failed to show by substantial evidence that all applicable criteria had been met, LUBA will affirm the local government's denial. Gambee v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 343 (2000).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. LUBA will not conclude that the statutory definition of high-value soils excludes soil complexes in which listed soils form the predominant part, where petitioner fails to establish a sufficient basis to form that conclusion. Tri-River Investment Co. v. Clatsop County, 37 Or LUBA 195 (1999).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. LUBA must affirm a decision denying a permit to site a dog kennel prohibited on high-value farmland, where petitioner fails to challenge the county's alternative finding that the subject property is high-value farmland because it is predominantly composed of a combination of two high-value soils. Tri-River Investment Co. v. Clatsop County, 37 Or LUBA 195 (1999).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. A petitioner challenging a city's denial of its land use application on evidentiary grounds bears the burden of demonstrating that only evidence supporting the application can be believed and that, as a matter of law, such evidence establishes compliance with each of the applicable criteria. Wiley Mtn., Inc. v. City of Albany, 36 Or LUBA 449 (1999).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a hearings officer gives several reasons why she was not persuaded by affidavit testimony submitted by a permit applicant, petitioner does not establish that the applicant carried his burden of proof as a matter of law. River City Disposal v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 360 (1998).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. A local government need only adopt one sustainable basis to deny a request for permit approval. Where petitioner fails to challenge all of the city's bases for denial, the decision must be affirmed. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Petitioner's disagreement with the reasons specified by a local government for rejecting the evidence he submitted in support of a land use application provides no basis for reversal or remand. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a local government denies a permit application following remand from the Court of Appeals and specifies more than one basis for the denial, in reviewing a subsequent appeal of the denial on remand LUBA need only review and sustain one of the bases for denial. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 34 Or LUBA 594 (1998).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Typically only one adequate basis for denial of a land use permit is required to sustain the decision on appeal to LUBA. However, where the approval criteria provide that a setback exception can be granted if any one of several alternative criteria are met and LUBA rejects the hearings officer's findings of noncompliance with two of those alternative criteria, a remand is appropriate. Parsley v. Jackson County, 34 Or LUBA 540 (1998).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where petitioner cites no evidence that partition plat contains words of road dedication and there is unrebutted testimony that a partition plat lacks terms of dedication, the local decision maker's finding that petitioner failed to prove road dedication on the basis of the partition plat is supported by substantial evidence. Petersen v. Yamhill County, 33 Or LUBA 584 (1997).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. To obtain reversal at LUBA of a city's variance denial, a petitioner must show that it proved its compliance with the criteria as a matter of law and that only its evidence should be believed. Main Auto Body v. City of Salem, 30 Or LUBA 194 (1995).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where the challenged decision denies an application, the local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. To challenge a denial on evidentiary grounds, petitioner must demonstrate compliance with all applicable criteria as a matter of law. Gionet v. City of Tualatin, 30 Or LUBA 96 (1995).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In challenging a local government's determination of noncompliance with an applicable approval standard on evidentiary grounds, petitioners must demonstrate they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with the applicable standard as a matter of law. Horizon Construction, Inc. v. City of Newberg, 28 Or LUBA 632 (1995).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a local government denies development approval based on noncompliance with a relevant approval standard, a petitioner's evidentiary challenge to that determination must cite evidence in the record demonstrating the standard is satisfied as a matter of law. Lyon v. Linn County, 28 Or LUBA 402 (1994).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. A Public Works Department memorandum showing traffic counts, setting out accident history and making a conditional recommendation that a traffic study may be deferred is not sufficient to show the applicant carried its burden as a matter of law with regard to compliance with a code minimal adverse impact standard. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 27 Or LUBA 453 (1994).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where a local government denies an application based on noncompliance with certain comprehensive plan housing policies, petitioners' argument that other plan housing policies should also be applied provides no basis for reversal or remand, where petitioners fail to establish how the local government's failure to apply the other policies undermines its decision to deny the application based on the policies it did apply. Shelter Resources, Inc. v. City of Cannon Beach, 27 Or LUBA 229 (1994).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where petitioners were the applicants below, and challenge on evidentiary grounds a local government determination that an applicable approval standard is not met, petitioners must demonstrate, as a matter of law, that they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with the standard. Kangas v. City of Oregon City, 26 Or LUBA 177 (1993).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. To overturn a denial decision on evidentiary grounds, an applicant must establish that the proposal satisfies each applicable approval standard as a matter of law. Decuman v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In order to overturn, on evidentiary grounds, a local government determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, it is not sufficient for petitioners to show there is substantial evidence in the record to support their position. Rather, petitioners must demonstrate they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with applicable criteria, as a matter of law. Thomas v. City of Rockaway Beach, 24 Or LUBA 532 (1993).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. To overturn on evidentiary grounds a local government's determination that an applicable approval standard is not met, a petitioner may not simply show that there is substantial evidence in the record to support his position. Rather, petitioner must demonstrate that he sustained his burden of proof of compliance with all applicable standards, as a matter of law. Baker v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 519 (1993).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In order to overturn on evidentiary grounds a local government's determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, it is not sufficient for petitioner to show there is substantial evidence in the record to support its position. Rather, the evidence must be such that a reasonable trier of fact could only say petitioner's evidence should be believed. Roozenboom v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 433 (1993).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. To overturn on evidentiary grounds a local government's determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, petitioners must demonstrate they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with applicable criteria, as a matter of law. Stockwell v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 358 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. Where the challenged decision denies a proposed development, the local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. Further, in challenging a denial decision on evidentiary grounds, petitioners have the burden of establishing compliance with each and every criterion as a matter of law. Woosley v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 231

(1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. To overturn a local government determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, on evidentiary grounds, petitioners must demonstrate that they sustained their burden to establish compliance with the applicable criterion as a matter of law. Chauncey v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 599 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In the absence of evidence in the record establishing the quantity of products delivered or dollar amount of sales by petitioners' business to farm uses within the local agricultural community, petitioners cannot demonstrate as a matter of law that their proposed use is a commercial activity in conjunction with farm use. Chauncey v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 599 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. An evidentiary challenge to a local government finding that the applicant failed to carry his burden of proof below requires that a petitioner at LUBA demonstrate the applicant carried that burden as a matter of law. Nelson v. Benton County, 23 Or LUBA 392 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. It is the applicant's burden to establish compliance with each relevant approval standard. Consequently, where the applicant fails to establish compliance with a single approval standard, a decision denying an application must be affirmed. West v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 558 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. It is the applicant's burden to establish compliance with each applicable approval standard, and a local government may not approve a proposal unless each approval standard is met. LUBA will sustain a decision denying land use approval, if such a decision demonstrates that one or more approval standards are not met. Seger v. City of Portland, 23 Or LUBA 334 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. For LUBA to overturn a local government's denial decision, petitioners must establish that the proposed development meets all applicable standards as a matter of law. Rath v. Hood River County, 23 Or LUBA 200 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In order to overturn, on evidentiary grounds, a local government determination that an approval standard is not met, petitioners must establish that the approval standard is satisfied as a matter of law. Schoppert v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 138 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. In order to overturn, on evidentiary grounds, a local government's determination that an applicable approval standard is not met, the evidence must be such that a reasonable trier of fact could only say petitioners' evidence should be believed. Goffic v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.2.3 Administrative Law – Denials – Burden to Challenge. A local government's denial of a development application will be sustained if the local government's determination that any one approval standard is not satisfied is sustained. Goffic v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the evidence is extremely one-sided in favor of a permit applicant challenging a county decision denying its application for permit approval for a natural gas pipeline on the basis that other uses allowed in the zone would be limited, it is possible to conclude that the permit applicant challenging the denial on evidentiary grounds carried its burden as a matter of law, as it must when challenging a permit denial on evidentiary grounds. But where that evidence is somewhat equivocal about whether some uses would be limited and does not address whether other uses would be limited, the evidentiary record is insufficient to demonstrate that the permit applicant carried its burden as a matter of law. Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A high pressure natural gas pipeline applicant challenging a board of commissioners' denial of its request for permit approval on evidentiary grounds does not carry its burden as a matter of law, as it must when challenging a permit denial on evidentiary grounds, where the applicant's own evidence show there is some danger of habitat damage from hydraulic fracturing and other evidence from permit opponents that hydraulic fracturing has caused habitat damage in other pipeline projects. Oregon Pipeline Company v. Clatsop County, 71 Or LUBA 246 (2015).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. ORS 215.296(1) requires some description of farm practices on surrounding farm lands, in order to evaluate whether the proposed conditional use will significantly change or increase the costs of such practices. Where the record and planning commission decision includes no such description, on local appeal the governing body could conclude that the planning commission decision approving the conditional use is not supported by substantial evidence. Hood River Valley PRD v. Hood River County, 67 Or LUBA 314 (2013).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. When a local ordinance requires that no additional vehicle trips enter an intersection during peak hours, an applicant cannot overcome a denial by merely encouraging visitors to use other routes to the site. Without an enforcement mechanism or evidence that such encouragement would be completely effective without an enforcement mechanism, the applicant has not demonstrated as a matter of law that no additional vehicle trips would enter the intersection during peak hours. Vista Construction, LLC v. City of Grants Pass, 59 Or LUBA 195 (2009).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A reasonable decision maker could conclude that the applicant for a proposed motorcycle race track failed to demonstrate compliance with an approval standard requiring that the property act as a buffer between urban and agricultural uses, which the county interpreted to require evidence that the race track, as mitigated, would externalize less dust than would agricultural use of the property, where the applicant failed to present any evidence quantifying dust impacts, comparing dust impacts of farm uses and the race track, or estimating the effectiveness of mitigation. Easterly v. Polk County, 59 Or LUBA 417 (2009).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where a hearings officer's evaluation of the evidence is based in part on a considered assessment that one set of witnesses is more credible or reliable than others with respect to a disputed factual issue, it will be a rare circumstance where LUBA has a basis to overturn that credibility judgment. Applebee v. Washington County, 54 Or LUBA 364 (2007).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In an evidentiary challenge to a hearings officer's denial of proposed development, the applicant can prevail only if the applicant demonstrates that no reasonable person could reach the conclusion the hearings officer did, considering the evidence in the whole record. Ehler v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 663 (2006).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A fire district letter opining that conducting large concert events of up to 5,500 people on a forest-zoned parcel would not significantly increase the risk of wildfires is not substantial evidence to support a finding to that effect, where the letter is expressly contingent on the applicant maintaining a prohibition on burning of any kind, and the evidence regarding the effectiveness of banning burning of any kind during large concert events is extremely limited and conclusory. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Assuming, without deciding, that an applicant's misrepresentation of a material fact in a discretionary permit proceeding would allow a local government to deny subsequent administrative permits necessary to carry out the earlier permit approval, the record supporting denial must establish that the applicant indeed misrepresented a material fact. Safeway, Inc. v. City of North Bend, 47 Or LUBA 489 (2004).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. The burden of overturning a permit denial on evidentiary grounds is even more difficult when the applicable approval criteria are highly subjective in nature, such as standards requiring "adequate" transportation improvements to "promote safety" and "reduce congestion." Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A traffic engineer's critique of the applicant's traffic study that questions the accuracy and sufficiency of the study's calculation of traffic impacts and facility capacity is sufficient to support denial of proposed development under standards requiring the applicant to demonstrate that nearby transportation facilities can accommodate traffic impacts of the development. Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Denial of a proposed school bus storage yard is supported by evidence that access to the yard relies on a private fire lane that the applicant cannot improve and that limits bus movement, under design standards requiring a "safe and efficient" circulation pattern. Oien v. City of Beaverton, 46 Or LUBA 109 (2003).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Given the subjectivity of criteria requiring that (1) the subject property be of adequate size to allow for "aesthetic design treatment," (2) the proposed building be "compatible" in scale and mass with adjoining structures, and (3) the site plan provide for "adequate" buffers, the testimony of residential neighbors that a proposed church on a 3.85-acre parcel fails to comply with these criteria is adequate to support the city's finding of noncompliance. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77

(2003).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Conclusory testimony by an acoustic engineer that a proposed church will not violate "maximum allowable noise levels" is insufficient to show compliance as a matter of law with code standards that require a demonstration that proposed uses will not exceed specific decibel levels within a specified distance from adjoining residential uses. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A city is entitled to rely on expert testimony that a specific model of the flood depth and velocity over the subject property is necessary to demonstrate compliance with a standard requiring no significant hazard to life or property, and the city may decline to extrapolate that information from other expert testimony that models an adjacent area. Starks Landing, Inc. v. City of Rivergrove, 43 Or LUBA 237 (2002).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. LUBA will remand a decision denying an application to place and remove fill in a riparian zone, where the findings do not independently address the relevant standards and it is not clear what evidence the hearings officer relied on to apply the standards. Griffin v. Jackson County, 41 Or LUBA 159 (2001).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A city's denial of a permit to construct a house proposed to be cantilevered out over the face of a sand bluff is supported by substantial evidence, where there is conflicting expert testimony regarding adverse impacts from structural supports sunk into the face of the bluff, and the city reasonably chose to believe an expert opinion that under no circumstances should the face of the bluff be compromised. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 37 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Neighbors' testimony regarding adverse impacts of vibration from construction on the integrity of a sand bluff underlying adjacent properties is substantial evidence supporting the city's denial of a house proposed to be built on the bluff, notwithstanding a contrary conclusion inferred from geotechnical reports supporting the application. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 37 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In determining whether a denial is supported by substantial evidence, LUBA considers all relevant evidence, including that which supports and that which detracts from the county's decision. Evenson v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 251 (1999).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. To successfully challenge the evidentiary basis for denial, it is not sufficient for petitioner to show there is evidence in the record to support his position; petitioner must show the evidence is such that a reasonable trier of fact could only decide in his favor. Where the record contains credible, conflicting evidence, petitioner has not sustained his burden to show, as a matter of law, that the trier of fact should only have believed petitioner's evidence. Evenson v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 251 (1999).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In challenging a decision denying a permit on evidentiary grounds, it is not sufficient to show the evidence would also have supported approval of the permit. The evidence must show that petitioner sustained his burden of proof as a matter of law. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the evidence is such that a reasonable person could conclude that a permit applicant failed to carry his burden of proof, the hearings officer's decision denying the permit is supported by substantial evidence. A hearings officer is not obligated to defer to an unopposed affidavit submitted by a permit applicant as establishing the facts alleged in the affidavit. River City Disposal v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 360 (1998).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. An applicant does not carry his burden to demonstrate compliance with transportation-related criteria, where the findings supporting denial identify a flaw in the applicant's evidence resulting from conducting a traffic study in the summer when school trips would not be reflected in the study. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where petitioner cites no evidence that partition plat contains words of road dedication and there is unrebutted testimony that a partition plat lacks terms of dedication, the local decision maker's finding that petitioner failed to prove road dedication on the basis of the partition plat is supported by substantial evidence. Petersen v. Yamhill County, 33 Or LUBA 584 (1997).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where an applicable criterion requires that a dwelling have the "least impact" on adjoining lands and the applicant does not show the dwelling could not be located on alternative sites on the property that would have fewer impacts, the applicant fails to demonstrate compliance with the criterion as a matter of law. Evans v. Multnomah County, 33 Or LUBA 555 (1997).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. A decision denying a requested nonconforming use determination is supported by substantial evidence, where the applicant's evidence had gaps and inconsistencies and the opponent's evidence was uniform. Tigard Sand and Gravel v. Clackamas County, 33 Or LUBA 124 (1997).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. To obtain reversal at LUBA of a city's variance denial, a petitioner must show that it proved its compliance with the criteria as a matter of law and that only its evidence should be believed. Main Auto Body v. City of Salem, 30 Or LUBA 194 (1995).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the challenged decision denies an application, the local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. To challenge a denial on evidentiary grounds, petitioner must demonstrate compliance with all applicable criteria as a matter of law. Gionet v. City of Tualatin, 30 Or LUBA 96 (1995).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. LUBA does not substitute its judgment regarding conflicting evidence in the record for that of the local government. If a reasonable person could reach the decision made by the local government, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between conflicting evidence. Gionet v. City of Tualatin, 30 Or LUBA 96 (1995).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In order to justify reversal or remand of a city's denial of a discretionary application, petitioner must establish, as a matter of law, that all approval criteria are satisfied. Where there is substantial evidence in the record, upon which the city relied, to determine that the application fails to comply with several comprehensive plan provisions, petitioner fails to sustain his burden of proof regardless of whether the application could satisfy some, or even all, of the applicable subdivision approval criteria. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 30 Or LUBA 85 (1995).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. To overturn the county's determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met on evidentiary grounds, it is not sufficient for petitioners to show there is substantial evidence in the record to support their position. Rather, the evidence must show that only petitioners' evidence should be believed. Sandgren v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 454 (1995).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In challenging a local government's determination of noncompliance with an applicable approval standard on evidentiary grounds, petitioners must demonstrate they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with the applicable standard as a matter of law. Horizon Construction, Inc. v. City of Newberg, 28 Or LUBA 632 (1995).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Applicants for approval to divide a 110-acre EFU-zoned parcel into 50- and 60-acre farm parcels fail to carry their burden of proof regarding a code standard requiring that the newly created parcels be of sufficient size to continue existing commercial agricultural enterprises in the area, where the applicants submit evidence concerning agricultural activity only on the property proposed to be divided. Van Veldhuizen v. Marion County, 26 Or LUBA 468 (1994).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where petitioners were the applicants below, and challenge on evidentiary grounds a local government determination that an applicable approval standard is not met, petitioners must demonstrate, as a matter of law, that they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with the standard. Kangas v. City of Oregon City, 26 Or LUBA 177 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. To overturn a denial decision on evidentiary grounds, an applicant must establish that the proposal satisfies each applicable approval standard as a matter of law. Decuman v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the local code includes a broad definition of the term "wetland," and the local government denies a permit application because it determines evidence in the record establishes that petitioner's grading activities on the subject property created a "wetland" within the meaning of the local code, LUBA cannot say that the local government's determination is wrong as a matter of law. Annett v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 111 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In order to overturn, on evidentiary grounds, a local government determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, it is not sufficient for petitioners to show there is substantial evidence in the record to support their position. Rather, petitioners must demonstrate they sustained their burden of proof of compliance with applicable criteria, as a matter of law. Thomas v. City of Rockaway Beach, 24 Or LUBA 532 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where a local government denies a setback variance to allow a deck on the side of a dwelling, and petitioners cite no evidence in the record establishing that having such a deck on the dwelling is more than a personal preference or amenity, petitioners fail to show the evidence in the record establishes, as a matter of law, that enforcement of the setback requirement will cause "practical difficulty or unnecessary hardship." Thomas v. City of Rockaway Beach, 24 Or LUBA 532 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. To overturn on evidentiary grounds a local government's determination that an applicable approval standard is not met, a petitioner may not simply show that there is substantial evidence in the record to support his position. Rather, petitioner must demonstrate that he sustained his burden of proof of compliance with all applicable standards, as a matter of law. Baker v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 519 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the local government relies upon evidence that there are several hundred acres within an urban growth boundary (UGB) available for residential development to support its determination that the applicant failed to establish a need for more residential land under Goal 14, factor 1, evidence that some of those acres of land may be unavailable for residential development does not establish the existence of a need for residential land within the existing UGB as a matter of law. Baker v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 519 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In order to overturn on evidentiary grounds a local government's determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, it is not sufficient for petitioner to show there is substantial evidence in the record to support its position. Rather, the evidence must be such that a reasonable trier of fact could only say petitioner's evidence should be believed. Roozenboom v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 433 (1993).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. There is substantial evidence to support a local government determination that a code standard requiring a proposed use not to be detrimental to the area or to adjacent properties is not satisfied where the record includes evidence that the subject business operation is noisy, operates on evenings and weekends, and generates a significant amount of sawdust. Stockwell v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 358 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the challenged decision denies a proposed development, the local government need only adopt findings, supported by substantial evidence, demonstrating that one or more standards are not met. Further, in challenging a denial decision on evidentiary grounds, petitioners have the burden of establishing compliance with each and every criterion as a matter of law. Woosley v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 231 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In the absence of evidence in the record establishing the quantity of products delivered or dollar amount of sales by petitioners' business to farm uses within the local agricultural community, petitioners cannot demonstrate as a matter of law that their proposed use is a commercial activity in conjunction with farm use. Chauncey v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 599 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In order to overturn, on evidentiary grounds, a local government determination that an approval standard is not met, petitioners must establish that the approval standard is satisfied as a matter of law. Schoppert v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 138 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where there is conflicting believable evidence in the record, LUBA cannot say a reasonable decision maker could only believe the evidence relied upon by petitioner, and will reject a challenge to the evidentiary support for a decision denying development approval. Joyce v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 116 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. To overturn on evidentiary grounds a local government's determination that an applicable approval criterion is not met, it is not sufficient for petitioners to show that there is substantial evidence in the record to support their position. Rather, the "evidence must be such that a reasonable trier of fact could only say petitioners' evidence should be believed." Barber v. Marion County, 23 Or LUBA 71 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where evidence in the record establishes that with adequate drainage a parcel could be put to farm use, petitioner has not established as a matter of law that the proposed nonfarm use is located on land "generally unsuitable" for farm use. Barber v. Marion County, 23 Or LUBA 71 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. In order to overturn, on evidentiary grounds, a local government's determination that an applicable approval standard is not met, the evidence must be such that a reasonable trier of fact could only say petitioners' evidence should be believed. Goffic v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.2.4 Administrative Law – Denials – Evidence to Support. Where the local code requires that additional dwellings in a forest zone "will not interfere with forest management or harvesting practices," and the parties cite no evidence in the record concerning the impacts of such additional dwellings on the use of the access road for forest management and harvesting, petitioners fail to demonstrate compliance with the approval standard as a matter of law. Goffic v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Recitals that the planning commission accepted the applicant's responses to each criterion as findings of fact and, with the findings in the staff report, recommended approval of the application to the governing body, which in turn approved the planning commission's recommendation, are insufficient to incorporate either the findings in the staff report or the findings prepared by the applicant into the governing body's final decision. Jacobus v. Klamath County, 81 Or LUBA 785 (2020).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. References to a staff report during oral deliberations and a city councilor's motion "to accept staff's recommendation" are insufficient to incorporate the staff report into the final decision where the city council does not orally approve or adopt the staff report and where the final decision does not mention the staff report, and the city may therefore not rely on the staff report in order to satisfy the requirement that its decision contain adequate findings. Niederer v. City of Albany, 79 Or LUBA 305 (2019).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. A city council decision that states "[t]he findings of fact in this matter are located in the staff report, incorporated herein as Exhibit A" is sufficient to satisfy the Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 251, 259 (1992), requirement to indicate an intent to incorporate another document as findings. Pinnacle Alliance Group, LLC v. City of Sisters, 73 Or LUBA 169 (2016).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Where a city council decision adopts "a staff report, incorporated herein as Exhibit A," as findings, but there is no staff report labeled Exhibit A and there are two staff reports the city council could have been referring to, the decision is not sufficient to satisfy the Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 251, 259 (1992), requirement to identify the document that is incorporated as findings. Pinnacle Alliance Group, LLC v. City of Sisters, 73 Or LUBA 169 (2016).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. A finding that the decision maker "reviewed" a number of documents is not sufficient to adopt or incorporate those documents as findings to support a decision. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Where additional explanations and legal theories in a decision for why an approval criterion is met are not alternative sets of independently dispositive findings, a petitioner's failure to challenge those additional explanations and legal theories does not require that LUBA deny an assignment of error that challenges the findings that an approval criterion is met. Siegert v. Crook County, 63 Or LUBA 379 (2011).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. LUBA will assume that a city council adopted a staff report as findings in its entirety, notwithstanding language purporting to incorporate only findings "that support approving the application," where all the findings in the staff report support approving the application. Soares v. City of Corvallis, 56 Or LUBA 551 (2008).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. A purported incorporation of "those portions" of the minutes of hearings that support approval of the application is ineffective, as it fails to adequately identify what testimony or portions of the minutes the governing body intends to incorporate as findings. Soares v. City of Corvallis, 56 Or LUBA 551 (2008).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Where it is possible to read a city council's findings as incorporating only the conditions of approval proposed in an attached staff report but it is also possible to read the city council's findings as incorporating the entire staff report as part of the city council's decision, but it is clear the city intended the latter, LUBA will reject petitioner's contention that the more limited reading of the city council's decision is required. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 50 Or LUBA 226 (2005).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. A local government's failure to adequately identify documents it intends to incorporate by reference as findings, and its adoption of testimony as findings, are not by themselves a basis for reversal or remand. Instead, the attempted incorporation fails and the city may not rely on such documents or testimony to provide "findings" in support of the decision. If the city has adopted other findings that adequately support the decision, the failed incorporation and improper attempt to adopt testimony as findings are harmless error. Staus v. City of Corvallis, 48 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. An attempt to incorporate documents in the record as findings of compliance with the Transportation Planning Rule fails, where the decision purports to incorporate hundreds of pages of minutes and written testimony without adequately identifying those documents, and the incorporation is qualified in a manner that makes it difficult or impossible to understand the facts relied upon and the justification for the decision. Staus v. City of Corvallis, 48 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. A decision maker may rely on environmental assessments and technical reports prepared and used by the decision maker in making its decision to demonstrate compliance with findings requirements, notwithstanding that the documents were not formally adopted as findings, where a reasonable person would understand that the decision maker intended to rely on the documents to support its decision. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Where petitioner challenges the adequacy of a local government's findings, and the challenged decision neither contains findings nor incorporates other documents into the decision as findings, LUBA will remand the decision for adoption or incorporation of necessary findings. Allen v. Grant County, 39 Or LUBA 232 (2000).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Oral discussion by the local decision makers reflected in the tape of the hearing does not constitute findings demonstrating compliance with applicable land use standards. Allen v. Grant County, 39 Or LUBA 232 (2000).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Oral comments by individual city council members are not findings and cannot constitute a reviewable interpretation of local code provisions. Breen v. City of Salem, 37 Or LUBA 961 (2000).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. A statement adopted by a planning commission but not incorporated into the city council's final decision does not constitute a reviewable finding. Hood River Valley Res. Comm. v. City of Hood River, 33 Or LUBA 233 (1997).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. Where findings adopted by the initial local decision maker interpreted a local ordinance provision, but those findings were replaced by findings adopted by the local governing body which do not include an interpretation of the ordinance provision, LUBA must remand the decision to the local government to interpret the provision in the first instance. Friends of Bryant Woods Park v. Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 185 (1993).

1.3.1 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – What Constitutes. The findings supporting a challenged decision may consist of several different documents, so long as the local government adequately identifies and specifically adopts those documents as findings. Neuharth v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 267 (1993).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Where a hearings official's findings explain the criteria that the hearings official considered relevant to the decision, state the facts relied upon in rendering the decision, and explain the justification for the decision based on the criteria, the hearings official's findings are adequate. The fact that a petitioner disagrees with those findings does not render them inadequate. Matthews v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 757 (2020).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. References to a staff report during oral deliberations and a city councilor's motion "to accept staff's recommendation" are insufficient to incorporate the staff report into the final decision where the city council does not orally approve or adopt the staff report and where the final decision does not mention the staff report, and the city may therefore not rely on the staff report in order to satisfy the requirement that its decision contain adequate findings. Niederer v. City of Albany, 79 Or LUBA 305 (2019).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. When an applicant chooses to use reclaimed wastewater on farmland, a written explanation of alternatives to water uses is a very limited obligation imposed by ORS 215.246(3). The county's role, indeed LUBA's review itself, is confined to ensuring that the applicant (1) considered in writing any sufficiently identified alternatives, and (2) explained in writing the reasons for not using them. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 78 Or LUBA 81 (2018).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. OAR 660-004-0022(6), which provides the standards for approving an exception to Goal 15, allows adverse effect on habitat as long as the adverse effect is not "significant." An argument that challenges a local government's findings that with mitigation, impacts to riparian habitat from a proposed new bridge project will not be significant because the need for mitigation at all demonstrates that the bridge will have a "significant adverse effect" on riparian values provides no basis for reversal or remand. Deumling v. City of Salem, 76 Or LUBA 99 (2017).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. To address a historic design standard requiring that new construction be "compatible with the appearance and character of the historic district," adequate findings must, at a minimum, describe the appearance and character of the historic district, as relevant, (2) describe the appearance and character of the proposed structure, and (3) explain why the proposed structure is or is not compatible with the appearance and character of the historic district. Kliewer v. City of Bend, 73 Or LUBA 321 (2016).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. The failure of a decision maker to list all of the evidence relied upon in making a decision is not necessarily fatal as long as the response brief directs LUBA to evidence in the record that supports the critical findings in the decision. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 101 (2003).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. When a local decision maker denies a person standing to participate in the local proceeding, the local decision maker must explain why that person was denied standing. Swanson v. Jackson County, 46 Or LUBA 629 (2004).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. The primary purpose of OAR 660-021-0030(5) is to develop findings that can form the basis of comprehensive plan language to guide future urbanization decisions. Thus, OAR 660-021-0030(5) requires that the local government adopt findings describing the results of its consideration of the suitability criteria in OAR 660-010-0030(2) for all lands included in urban reserves. D.S. Parklane Development, Inc. v. Metro, 35 Or LUBA 516 (1999).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Where a local government includes lands in urban reserves under one or more of the exceptions provided in OAR 660-021-0030(4), it must adopt findings as required by OAR 660-021-0030(5) that are sufficient to ensure that those lands are developed in accordance with the justification for including them in urban reserves. D.S. Parklane Development, Inc. v. Metro, 35 Or LUBA 516 (1999).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. A county impermissibly defers a finding of compliance with a standard requiring that the lot be capable of being served with a domestic water supply, where there is no evidence or finding that an adequate domestic water supply is feasible, and the county's finding of compliance relies exclusively on a condition requiring that the applicant establish a domestic water supply. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Findings are inadequate where a local government's decision makes conclusory statements of compliance with the applicable approval criteria without giving any factual or legal analysis to support the conclusion that the application complies with each of the criteria. Larvik v. City of La Grande, 34 Or LUBA 467 (1998).

Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Findings that the applicant has testified that applicable criteria will be met are conclusory and inadequate because they fail to identify the review standards, set out the facts relied upon or explain how those facts led to the decision. Turrell v. Harney County, 34 Or LUBA 423 (1998).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Findings are adequate and supported by substantial evidence when the decision maker assembles evidence, identifies the relevant code standard, sets out the evidence found to be persuasive and explains how that evidence led to the decision. Mountain Gate Homeowners v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 169 (1998).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. When a challenged decision fails to incorporate a staff report or council minutes as findings, LUBA's review of the challenged decision for adequate findings is limited to the decision itself. Hackler v. City of Hermiston, 33 Or LUBA 755 (1997).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Local findings addressing an approval criterion may be viewed together with findings in other documents that are incorporated into the decision as findings, in order to comply with the requirements that findings identify the applicable criteria, adequately demonstrate the facts relied upon and adequately explain how those facts show compliance with the applicable criteria. Winkler v. City of Cottage Grove, 33 Or LUBA 543 (1997).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Local government findings of compliance with an applicable approval standard must state the facts the local government relies on and explain why those facts lead to the conclusion that the standard is satisfied. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 28 Or LUBA 123 (1994).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Findings must identify relevant approval standards, identify the facts relied upon, and explain why those facts support a conclusion that the standard is met. Testa v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 357 (1994).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. A local government decision approving a permit will be remanded to the local government if the decision fails to (1) identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts believed and relied upon by the local decision maker, and (3) explain how those facts lead to a decision that the proposal complies with the approval standards. Lathrop v. Wallowa County, 25 Or LUBA 693 (1993).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. A local government decision approving a quasi-judicial zone change must be supported by written findings identifying the applicable criteria, setting out the facts relied on and explaining the reasons why the facts establish compliance with the applicable standards. Strecker v. City of Spray, 25 Or LUBA 264 (1993).

1.3.2 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Necessary Elements. Findings must identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts which are believed and relied upon, and (3) explain how those facts lead to the decision on compliance with the approval standards. Heiller v. Josephine County, 23 Or LUBA 551 (1992).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A city council decision that states "[t]he findings of fact in this matter are located in the staff report, incorporated herein as Exhibit A" is sufficient to satisfy the Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 or LUBA 251, 259 (1992), requirement to indicate an intent to incorporate another document as findings. Pinnacle Alliance Group, LLC v. City of Sisters, 73 Or LUBA 169 (2016).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where a city council decision adopts "a staff report, incorporated herein as Exhibit A," as findings, but there is no staff report labeled Exhibit A and there are two staff reports the city council could have been referring to, the decision is not sufficient to satisfy the Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 or LUBA 251, 259 (1992), requirement to identify the document that is incorporated as findings. Pinnacle Alliance Group, LLC v. City of Sisters, 73 Or LUBA 169 (2016).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. LUBA will not assume the planning commission intended to adopt a subdivision opponent's letter opposing the application as findings in support of the planning commission's decision to approve the subdivision application, simply because that letter was included as an attachment to the planning staff report that was adopted as findings. Lockwood v. City of Salem, 51 Or LUBA 334 (2006).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where it is possible to read a city council's findings as incorporating only the conditions of approval proposed in an attached staff report but it is also possible to read the city council's findings as incorporating the entire staff report as part of the city council's decision, but it is clear the city intended the latter, LUBA will reject petitioner's contention that the more limited reading of the city council's decision is required. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 50 Or LUBA 226 (2005).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A local government's failure to adequately identify documents it intends to incorporate by reference as findings, and its adoption of testimony as findings, are not by themselves a basis for reversal or remand. Instead, the attempted incorporation fails and the city may not rely on such documents or testimony to provide "findings" in support of the decision. If the city has adopted other findings that adequately support the decision, the failed incorporation and improper attempt to adopt testimony as findings are harmless error. Staus v. City of Corvallis, 48 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. An attempt to incorporate documents in the record as findings of compliance with the Transportation Planning Rule fails, where the decision purports to incorporate hundreds of pages of minutes and written testimony without adequately identifying those documents, and the incorporation is qualified in a manner that makes it difficult or impossible to understand the facts relied upon and the justification for the decision. Staus v. City of Corvallis, 48 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A decision maker may rely on environmental assessments and technical reports prepared and used by the decision maker in making its decision to demonstrate compliance with findings requirements, notwithstanding that the documents were not formally adopted as findings, where a reasonable person would understand that the decision maker intended to rely on the documents to support its decision. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. That the local government's Goal 14 findings incorporate other findings by reference does not demonstrate inadequacy in the county's Goal 14 findings, absent a showing that the county's findings as a whole, including the incorporated findings, are inadequate. Alliance for Responsible Land Use v. Deschutes Cty., 40 Or LUBA 304 (2001).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. LUBA will deny an assignment of error that challenges a decision for failing to make findings regarding applicable criteria when the decision properly incorporates additional findings that do address the applicable approval criteria, and the incorporated findings are not inadequate on their face. McNern v. City of Corvallis, 39 Or LUBA 591 (2001).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A statement by a governing body in its decision that it is incorporating as findings a separate document that it has specifically identified in its findings is effective in doing so, even if the title of the separate document is misstated in the decision. Winkler v. City of Cottage Grove, 33 Or LUBA 543 (1997).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where a decision expressly incorporates an entire document by reference into its findings and quotes specific findings from the incorporated document, the scope of the incorporation is not limited to the quoted findings. Winkler v. City of Cottage Grove, 33 Or LUBA 543 (1997).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Final decisions may incorporate findings in other documents prepared by staff or an applicant, but may not do so in a way that leaves the parties and LUBA guessing which documents are made part of the decision or where the necessary findings may be located in the record. DLCD v. Tillamook County, 33 Or LUBA 323 (1997).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where the county commissioners' final decision purports to adopt unspecified portions of the planning director's and hearings officer's decisions, but LUBA cannot determine from the final decision which portions of the lower decisions the commissioners intended to adopt, LUBA will rely solely on the commissioners' decision and those portions of the lower decisions that are specifically identified in the final decision. Spencer Creek Neighbors v. Lane County, 32 Or LUBA 349 (1997).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where the county's findings regarding parcel size and ownership patterns on lands adjacent to a proposed exception area contain no reference to the analysis required by OAR 660-04-028(6)(c)(A), and do not suggest that the county is relying upon separate incorporated documents to provide that analysis, the county's incorporation of the entire application does not provide a sufficient reference to the specific documents relied upon by the county to satisfy the applicable criteria. Johnson v. Lane County, 31 Or LUBA 454 (1996).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. If a local government wishes to incorporate all or portions of another document by reference into its findings, it must (1) clearly indicate its intent to do so; and (2) clearly identify the document or portions of the document so incorporated. A local government decision will satisfy these requirements if a reasonable person reading the decision would realize that another document is incorporated into the findings and, based on the decision itself, would be able both to identify and to request the opportunity to review the specific document thus incorporated. Johnson v. Lane County, 31 Or LUBA 454 (1996).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. The attachment as an exhibit to the city's decision of a plot plan showing 3.95 acres of "open space" does not impose an unstated condition of approval requiring dedication of the open space, when the text of the decision makes clear it does not rely on that aspect of the plot plan. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where LUBA cannot determine which portions of a lower level local decision maker's decision are incorporated into the challenged governing body decision, the governing body's decision must be remanded. Ellis v. City of Bend, 28 Or LUBA 332 (1994).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A local government decision maker may adopt staff-prepared findings as its own. That the planner who prepared the findings later advised the decision maker the findings are erroneous does not establish that the findings in fact are erroneous. Gettman v. City of Bay City, 28 Or LUBA 116 (1994).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where the challenged decision states the decision maker "adopts" a certain document and "makes it part of" the findings, that document is incorporated by reference into the findings and, under OAR 661-10-025(1)(a), is part of the local record, as findings. Bates v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 673 (1994).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A statement in a local government's findings that it "accepts and relies on" the contents of a specific exhibit in the record "to establish" certain facts required by an applicable approval standard, indicates the local government's intent to adopt the contents of that exhibit as a statement of what the local government believes to be the relevant facts and, therefore, is adequate to incorporate the exhibit into the findings. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 106 (1994).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where the challenged decision refers to a staff report and the applicant's proposed findings and explicitly incorporates those documents by reference, and those documents are attached as exhibits to the decision, the decision adequately adopts those documents as findings in support of the decision. Lucier v. City of Medford, 26 Or LUBA 213 (1994).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where a governing body's decision includes a statement that the governing body affirms the planning commission decision expressed in specific findings, such statement indicates the governing body either adopted the planning commission findings and determinations by reference or let the planning commission's decision become final and subject to review as part of the governing body's decision. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 312 (1993).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. The findings supporting a challenged decision may consist of several different documents, so long as the local government adequately identifies and specifically adopts those documents as findings. Neuharth v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 267 (1993).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A party's submission of proposed findings to a local decision maker does not constitute an ex parte contact warranting reversal or remand. In the absence of a local code provision to the contrary, there is no error in a local government's utilization of such a process. Caine v. Tillamook County, 25 Or LUBA 209 (1993).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. A statements in a local government's findings that "substantial evidence in the record shows * * *" is not a recitation of evidence, but rather an expression of what the decision maker believes the evidence in the record demonstrates; and is, therefore, proper as a finding of fact. DLCD v. Coos County, 25 Or LUBA 158 (1993).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where a challenged decision incorporates other documents by reference as findings, the decision must clearly indicate its intent to incorporate the documents, and (2) identify the documents or portions of them. DLCD v. Crook County, 24 Or LUBA 393 (1993).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. If a local government decision maker incorporates all or portions of a separate document by reference into its findings, it must clearly (1) indicate its intent to do so, and (2) identify the document or portions of the document so incorporated. Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 251 (1992).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. Where a decision maker does not clearly identify in its decision the portions of a document that it adopts by reference as findings, it runs a risk that LUBA will not be able to identify and review any portion of such document as findings of the decision maker. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 98 (1992).

1.3.3 Administrative Law – Findings Generally – Form of. In the absence of a specific provision in the local code to the contrary, there is no general requirement that a party have an opportunity to object to proposed findings submitted to the local decision maker by the prevailing party in a local land use proceeding. Adler v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 1 (1992).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. For purposes of evaluating whether the shipping associated with the proposed terminal would substantially interfere with the public trust rights of other waterway users, current navigation rules (e.g., those providing that a fishing boat must move out of a tanker's course as necessary to prevent collision) do not provide relevant context. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 81 Or LUBA 839 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local government approves a liquefied natural gas (LNG) terminal to and from which tankers will be required to transit an estuary, and where the United States Coast Guard declares that it will impose a mobile "security zone" around each tanker, extending 500 yards on each side, from which all other vessels are generally excluded, findings that the security zone will not substantially interfere with public trust rights in the estuary are inadequate where they do not address testimony that two jetties at the mouth of the estuary form a relatively narrow channel and that tankers and large fleets of fishing vessels may need to transit the mouth of the estuary at the same time, at or near high tide. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 81 Or LUBA 839 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In the absence of countervailing expert testimony, LUBA will accept farmers' contention that compliance with an EPA rule prescribing an Application Exclusion Zone (AEZ) for outdoor pesticide application is an accepted farm practice for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), regardless of whether it is applicable law, and a county errs by not analyzing the impacts of approving a recreational area on EFU land with respect to the EPA AEZ. Schrepel v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 895 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A finding of compliance with local water quality protection standards based on a condition of approval that requires the applicant to obtain federal and state environmental permits for its proposed wetland fill/removal is inadequate where the local government does not cite any specific state or federal standards or explain how those standards will ensure that the local water quality protection standards are satisfied. Royal Blue Organics v. City of Springfield, 81 Or LUBA 723 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a hearings official's findings explain the criteria that the hearings official considered relevant to the decision, state the facts relied upon in rendering the decision, and explain the justification for the decision based on the criteria, the hearings official's findings are adequate. The fact that a petitioner disagrees with those findings does not render them inadequate. Matthews v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 757 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's findings that there is adequate existing storage capacity to accommodate a modest growth in fossil fuel demand and, therefore, that a prohibition on establishing new fossil fuel terminals (FFTs) and expanding existing FFTs will "[l]imit fossil fuels distribution and storage facilities to those necessary to serve the regional market" are (1) inadequate where natural gas falls under a local government's definition of fossil fuels and where the findings do not address natural gas needs and (2) unsupported by an adequate factual base where the record establishes that natural gas demand will increase and where there is no evidence of the amount of terminal and storage capacity needed for natural gas generally. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 81 Or LUBA 683 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's findings that a prohibition on establishing new fossil fuel terminals (FFTs) and expanding existing FFTs will "[m]aintain and strengthen [the local government's] comparative economic advantages including access to a high-quality workforce" because the prohibition will apply to only one type of business are inadequate where they fail to consider the relationship between the FFTs, any products they make locally available to other businesses, and any resulting impact on the workforce. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 81 Or LUBA 683 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings concluding that an aggregate quarry would be compatible with an adjacent grazing operation and periodic logging are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence without an explanation of the manner in which the grazing operation is run—for example, whether it is seasonal or includes accessory activities such as breeding or calving—and the nature of the periodic logging. Currie v. Douglas County, 81 Or LUBA 602 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings concluding that an aggregate quarry satisfies the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1) are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence where the county identifies grazing as the only surrounding farm or forest use but does not verify that the grazing operation is in fact limited to grazing, without other uses such as breeding, or establish that logging on the grazing property, government ownership of surrounding forest lands, or maintaining of surrounding forest land as a timber investment do not involve protected forest activity. Currie v. Douglas County, 81 Or LUBA 602 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that site design review be based upon consideration of the "[c]haracteristics of adjoining and surrounding uses," the local government does not err by characterizing adjoining and surrounding uses simply as farm uses, even where the adjoining and surrounding lands contain dwellings, where the lands are zoned for farm and forest uses, where the dwellings are allowed in conjunction with farm and forest uses, and where the purpose of the zones and the comprehensive plan is to protect and conserve farm and forest lands for farm and forest uses. Anderson v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 618 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Arguments that the city council's findings are inadequate because they do not explain why the city council disagreed with the planning commission provide no basis for reversal or remand where the city council adopted findings explaining its reasons for concluding that the criteria are met and where the petitioner does not identify any requirement in the code or elsewhere for the city council to explain why it reached a different conclusion than the planning commission. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Bandon, 81 Or LUBA 285 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. That two applicants for conditional use permits for two solar facilities are contemporaneously seeking partition approval to create two 320-acre parcels from the same parent tract for the proposed facilities does not establish that the proposed facilities will not be on a "single tract," for purposes of OAR 660-033-

0130(38)(f), where there is no evidence, findings, or conditions that such partitions have or will become final and that the two 320-acre parcels have been or will be conveyed, by deed, to third parties. ODFW v. Lake County, 81 Or LUBA 300 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A condition of approval requiring an applicant for a conditional use permit for a solar facility to continue working privately with ODFW to agree on a wildlife habitat mitigation plan, outside a public participatory process, and return to the county for approval of the mitigation plan only if the applicant is unable to reach agreement with ODFW, is not sufficient to establish compliance with OAR 660-033-0130(38)(j)(G) for the reasons stated in Gould v. Deschutes County, 216 Or App 150, 171 P3d 1017 (2007), where it does not require a subsequent county proceeding on the mitigation plan and where it does not specify that the subsequent proceeding will be infused with the same participatory rights as the initial conditional use permit proceeding. ODFW v. Lake County, 81 Or LUBA 300 (2020).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local government legislatively decreases the height limit in one part of a historic district and increases the height limit in another part of the historic district, findings that focus on the importance of creating incentives for development of vacant parcels in the historic district, determine that the new height limits are lower than those outside the historic district, and conclude that "the issue of consistency [is] best left to the Landmarks Commission who remain charged with reviewing future development proposals" are not adequate to explain how the new height limits comply with a comprehensive plan policy that requires the local government to "preserv[e] and complement[] historic resources." Restore Oregon v. City of Portland, 80 Or LUBA 158 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. While applying pesticides and herbicides in a manner that causes overspray or drift onto adjoining properties is not an accepted farm practice for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), where the labels for some pesticides and herbicides effectively require a setback from certain sensitive uses regardless of whether drift or overspray occurs, a county will likely have to make specific factual findings about the specific setbacks required by particular chemicals on particular farming operations on surrounding farmlands, based on application methods, and whether the operation of each setback would force a significant change in farm practices. Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 348 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A condition of approval requiring that an applicant construct a proposed fence between a proposed trail and adjoining farms; specifying only that the proposed fence must be "capable of preventing dogs and people from entering adjacent farm fields"; punting all determinations regarding fence design, materials, construction, etc. to a subsequent master planning process that offers no opportunity for a public hearing or other public input; and allowing adjacent landowners to opt out of installing a fence on their property line is inadequate where the county relies on the proposed fence to address a wide variety of different potential impacts, which might require different fence designs, materials, construction techniques, and maintenance routines in order to ensure that the trail will not cause significant impacts on farm practices for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1).

Such a condition is also not clear and objective for purposes of ORS 215.296(2). Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 348 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local code provision requires a finding that "[t]he proposed use is appropriate, considering the adequacy of public facilities and services existing or planned for the area affected by the use," and where the record includes undisputed expert testimony that fire and emergency access are inadequate unless a proposed trail and its bridges are built to certain standards, it is insufficient for the local government to state, without any supporting evidence, that it is "feasible" to design the trail and bridges to provide adequate fire and emergency access and then punt all determinations regarding trail and bridge design to a subsequent master planning process. Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 348 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. References to a staff report during oral deliberations and a city councilor's motion "to accept staff's recommendation" are insufficient to incorporate the staff report into the final decision where the city council does not orally approve or adopt the staff report and where the final decision does not mention the staff report, and the city may therefore not rely on the staff report in order to satisfy the requirement that its decision contain adequate findings. Niederer v. City of Albany, 79 Or LUBA 305 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a county determines that a property qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750 because at least three dwellings existed on surrounding lots or parcels on January 1, 1993, based on a statement of the applicant, a recollection of the prior owner of one of the surrounding dwellings, an email from a contractor who worked on one of the surrounding dwellings, and a statement by the tax assessor that its records showed a dwelling in place on January 1, 1993, but where LUBA concludes that the county erred in accepting the email, where LUBA cannot determine whether the county would have reached the same conclusion without the email, and where the county's findings failed to address evidence that the tax rolls indicate existence of the dwelling as of July 1993 rather than January 1993, LUBA will remand for the county to adopt adequate findings. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Absent a legal definition for how the center point of a property must be established for purposes of determining whether it qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750, a county errs by not explaining the basis for its conclusion that its chosen method is the most appropriate and by not addressing opponents' arguments challenging that method. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a county determines that a property qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750 because at least three dwellings existed on surrounding lots or parcels on January 1, 1993, based on a statement of the applicant, a recollection of the prior owner of one of the surrounding dwellings, an email from a contractor who worked on one of the surrounding dwellings, and a statement by the tax assessor that its records showed a dwelling in place on January 1, 1993, but where LUBA concludes that the county erred in accepting the email, where LUBA cannot determine whether the county would have reached the same conclusion without the email, and where the county's findings failed to address evidence that the tax rolls indicate existence of the dwelling as of July 1993 rather than January 1993, LUBA will remand for the county to adopt adequate findings. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Absent a legal definition for how the center point of a property must be established for purposes of determining whether it qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750, a county errs by not explaining the basis for its conclusion that its chosen method is the most appropriate and by not addressing opponents' arguments challenging that method. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. When a county has evaluated facts, evidence, and argument in the record in reaching its decision and adopted findings in support of its decision, it is not necessary for the county to incorporate specific documents as findings. Wachal v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 227 (2018).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A single set of findings may be relied on to address more than one similar comprehensive plan goal or policy, so long as the findings are adequate to show the proposal complies with both standards. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 74 Or LUBA 176 (2016).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. There is no general requirement that a city council discuss the evidence it chooses not to rely on and a city council's failure to discuss opposing evidence does not necessarily mean the city council did not consider that opposing evidence. Evans v. City of Bandon, 74 Or LUBA 418 (2016).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's decision that identifies by subject the portion of a staff report that is incorporated as findings in the final decision is adequate to incorporate the findings section of the staff report as findings. Altamont Homeowners' Assoc., Inc. v. City of Happy Valley, 73 Or LUBA 126 (2016).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A finding that the decision maker "reviewed" a number of documents is not sufficient to adopt or incorporate those documents as findings to support a decision. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Absent LCDC rule-making, whether proposed industrial use of rural land is rural or urban in nature requires consideration of the factors described in case law. Where a county takes a reason exception to allow a wide range of unspecified industrial uses without considering the factors described in case law, the county's bare finding that the proposed amendments do not authorize urban use of rural land is inadequate and conclusory. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Columbia County, 70 Or LUBA 171 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. If a local government's decision fails to adequately identify the documents incorporated as findings, or attempts to incorporate documents that do not include findings, the purported incorporation of those other documents and materials fails, and the city may not rely on those documents to defend against a specific inadequate findings challenge. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. If a local government attempts to incorporate as findings documents that are not fairly described as findings, those documents may not be relied upon as findings to support the decision. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's incorporation of "any attachments or exhibits" to other incorporated documents that does not adequately describe those attachments or exhibits, and essentially attempts to sweep into the decision a number of documents that do not function as findings, is overbroad and fails. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's incorporation of documents that are not adequately described by date, title, or subject in either the description included in the decision, or in the record itself, fails and the documents will not be considered in resolving an inadequate findings challenge. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings are inadequate to explain why fire protection standards are met where the findings do not address whether the standards are met or why the evidence in the record supports a conclusion that it is feasible to meet the standards, particularly where the only evidence in the record is that the fire district is concerned about wildfires and will perform the required inspections. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 368 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings are inadequate to explain why the hearings officer concluded that a proposed aggregate operation will not force a significant change in or significantly increase the cost of accepted farming practices where the decision fails to consider whether the standard is met but rather relies on a determination that a haul road that opponents argue will force a significant change in farming practices was authorized in previous decisions. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 368 (2014).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Remand is necessary where a city deletes two refinement plan policies requiring protection of existing manufactured dwelling parks, and zones the parks to make them non-conforming uses, but the findings do not explain how the amendments are consistent with a comprehensive plan policy requiring conservation of existing affordable housing. Shamrock Homes LLC v. City of Springfield, 68 Or LUBA 1 (2013).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings that satisfaction of DEQ noise standards is feasible based on measures identified in a noise study as a combination of noise control measures that might not utilize a noise attenuation berm are adequate and are supported by substantial evidence in the record, where a noise berm is not categorically precluded or required as a mitigation measure and the noise study specifically left open the possibility that other measures without a noise berm could satisfy the standard. Protect Grand Island Farms v. Yamhill County, 67 Or LUBA 278 (2013).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In approving a final planned unit development (PUD), where the hearings officer defers for a second time a determination that a tentative PUD complies with geotechnical requirements to subsequent building and site development permit stages, such a deferral runs afoul of Gould v. Deschutes County, 216 Or App 150, 162, 171 P3d 1017 (2007), because those development stages are not infused with the same participatory rights as the Tentative PUD approval phase or the Final PUD approval phase. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 24 (2011).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A petitioner at LUBA who alleges a land use decision should be remanded because a local government failed to address a relevant issue must (1) identify the issue raised, (2) demonstrate the issue was adequately raised, and (3) establish the issue is relevant to applicable approval criteria in some way. A petitioner who simply refers to 86 pages of single spaced written argument below fails to carry that burden. Rosenzweig v. City of McMinnville, 64 Or LUBA 402 (2011).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. General findings that address some of the impacts of a proposal on the surrounding neighborhood are inadequate to explain how the proposal satisfies specific conditional use criteria that apply to the proposal. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 63 Or LUBA 20 (2011).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government does not impermissibly defer making a determination of compliance with an applicable approval criterion to a future proceeding when it imposes a condition of approval that requires a 12-foot-wide multi-use path to be constructed in a location within a 45-foot easement area to be determined in the future by the applicant, but rather allows an applicant the flexibility to construct the path in the location within that easement area that minimizes adverse impacts to a protected riparian area. League of Women Voters v. City of Corvallis, 63 Or LUBA 432 (2011).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A zoning ordinance PUD Master Plan modification criterion that requires that the modification not have significant additional impacts on surrounding properties applies at the time the PUD Master Plan is modified, and the required finding that the modification will not have such impacts must be made at the time the PUD is modified and that finding cannot be deferred to a later date even though the precise nature of development may be better known at that later date. Athletic Club of Bend v. City of Bend, 63 Or LUBA 467 (2011).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A petitioner's argument that the city failed to comply with a transportation system plan policy that requires that the city hold a public meeting with affected property owners before selecting a roadway alignment provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the city adopted findings that the cited policy does not apply to the kind of decision on appeal and was satisfied even if it did apply, and petitioner fails to assign error to or otherwise challenge those findings. Reeves v. City of Wilsonville, 62 Or LUBA 142 (2010).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a petitioner does not challenge a hearings officer's finding that petitioner's use of his property for a wedding event required review and county approval under one code provision, and petitioner does not allege his wedding event received county review and approval, petitioner's arguments that the use could have been approved under a different code provision provide no basis for reversal or remand. Reed v. Jackson County, 61 Or LUBA 253 (2010).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where there is (1) a lack of evidence that the additional parking spaces that would be required under a legislative land use regulation amendment will materially increase the total number of vehicle trips, (2) some evidence that the legislative amendment will not cause trips to increase materially, and (3) petitioner does not identify which transportation facilities it believes will be significantly affected by the amendment, a local government's brief finding that the legislative amendment will not significantly affect transportation facilities is adequate. Home Builders Association v. City of Eugene, 59 Or LUBA 116 (2009).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's legislative land use regulation amendment that increases the required number of off-street parking spaces for multiple family dwellings could impact the local government's plan to comply with OAR 660-012-0045(5)(c)(A), which requires that the local government have a parking plan which "[a]chieves a 10% reduction in the number of parking spaces per capita in the MPO." Where such a legislative land use decision is not supported by findings that address OAR 660-012-0045(5)(c)(A), the decision must be remanded. Home Builders Association v. City of Eugene, 59 Or LUBA 116 (2009).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A mitigation plan that is submitted to comply with a destination resort approval standard that requires that destination resorts employ mitigation measures to ensure "no net loss of wildlife" is inadequate where that mitigation plan proposes off-site mitigation and the location of the 4,501 acres that provide the needed mitigation, the nature of the habitat on those 4,501 acres, and the particular mix of mitigation measures that will be employed on those 4,501 acres are all unknown. Those details must be supplied at a stage where opponents still have a meaningful opportunity to challenge the adequacy of the proposed mitigation plan. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A finding that a proposed stormwater drainage facility complies with applicable criteria in the city's Stormwater Master Plan is inadequate, where the findings do not identify the "criteria" in the Master Plan or explain why they are satisfied. Soares v. City of Corvallis, 56 Or LUBA 551 (2008).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a petitioner does not explain why challenged findings are inadequate, but rather disagrees with the conclusion reached in those findings, petitioner's challenge to the findings will not be sustained. Knapp v. City of Corvallis, 55 Or LUBA 376 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Petitioner's argument that a finding is not supported by substantial evidence provides no basis for reversal or remand, where petitioner does not establish that the finding is required to address a relevant legal standard. Meadow Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 54 Or LUBA 124 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Demonstrating that a land use proposal satisfies relevant approval criteria, because there are "feasible solutions to identified problems" regarding those approval criteria, requires some explanation of what those feasible solutions are. If that explanation that explanation of feasible solutions is provided, it is an adequate substitute for a more direct or precise finding that the approval criterion is satisfied, and the choice among those feasible solutions can occur in a technical or administrative review process, without additional public hearings. Gould v. Deschutes County, 54 Or LUBA 205 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where an approval criterion requires a finding that the proposed land use "will be compatible with existing or anticipated uses in terms of size, building scale and style, intensity, setbacks, and landscaping," the local government must identify "existing or anticipated uses," describe those uses in the terms specified, describe the proposed land use in the terms specified, and then perform the required comparison to determine if the proposed land use and existing or anticipated uses will be compatible. Where a city's decision does none of those things, the decision will be remanded. Caster v. City of Silverton, 54 Or LUBA 441 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local code allows a non-farm dwelling only on land that is not predominantly composed of Class I through Class VI soils, and the property is composed predominantly of Class VI soils, a local government errs in finding that an application complies with that code provision. Ott v. Lake County, 54 Or LUBA 502 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government's conclusory finding that a sign plan complies with applicable criteria is not a basis for remand where the signage standards are clear and objective, and petitioners do not identify anything about the sign plan or the applicable standards that require more detailed discussion or findings. Western Express v. Umatilla County, 54 Or LUBA 571 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a city council adopts a staff report as supporting findings and the staff report quotes the applicant's proposed findings verbatim, but inserts the words "applicant states" at the beginning of each finding, LUBA will reject a challenge that the findings are inadequate to express what the city council found where: (1) the findings are worded as findings, (2) the findings immediately follow the criteria the findings address, and (3) it is sufficiently clear from the decision that the city council intended to adopt the applicant's findings as its own. Ettro v. City of Warrenton, 53 Or LUBA 485 (2007).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. LUBA frequently analyzes findings challenges and evidentiary challenges separately and generally analyzes findings challenges first, because LUBA's resolution of the findings challenge frequently affects its resolution of the evidentiary challenge or makes it unnecessary to decide the evidentiary challenge. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where petitioners allege that certain findings supporting a land use decision are not supported by substantial evidence, but there are other unchallenged findings addressing the same criterion and it does not appear that the challenged findings are critical to the local government's decision, petitioners' challenge provides no basis for reversal or remand. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 52 Or LUBA 325 (2006).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. City findings that there has been increased commercial development in the neighborhood and that traffic has increased on a nearby state highway and resulted in increased noise are sufficient to demonstrate compliance with a subjective "changed neighborhood conditions" rezoning criterion. Jaffer v. City of Monmouth, 51 Or LUBA 633 (2006).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where planning staff recommended findings and a planning commission recommendation appear in the record immediately behind a transcript of a city council motion to adopt an ordinance and the transcript shows that the city council's decision was based on the planning commission recommendation and the staff's proposed findings, the city council's motion is sufficient to adopt the planning commission recommendation and staff proposed findings as findings in support of its decision. Rhodes v. City of Talent, 50 Or LUBA 415 (2005).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. When a petitioner challenges findings deferring compliance with applicable approval criteria, that petitioner must: (1) identify the applicable approval criteria; (2) identify the findings that defer consideration of those criteria; and (3) explain how that deferral is inadequate to ensure compliance with the approval criteria. O'Shea v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 498 (2005).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings that conclude access is available to an adjoining road, but do not explain how the road may be accessed, are not supported by substantial evidence where all of the evidence cited to LUBA indicates that access is not possible. Seaton v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 178 (2004).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Failure to adopt findings addressing a comprehensive plan policy requiring provision of preferential carpool and vanpool parking for new commercial uses is not a basis for remand, where the code leaves details of parking lot construction and striping to the city engineer at building permit review, the challenged decision requires the applicant to comply with all code parking requirements, and the petitioner offers no reason that the city engineer cannot require the applicant to provide carpool and vanpool parking as part of building permit review. Heilman v. City of Corvallis, 47 Or LUBA 305 (2004).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a non-duplicative plat name is a criterion for preliminary plat approval, a city does not err by granting preliminary plat approval without a plat name and imposing a condition of approval that the applicant submit a non-duplicative plat name prior to final plat approval. For such an approval criterion, it is at most harmless error that the city failed to find that it is feasible for the applicant to submit the required non-duplicative plat name. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 47 Or LUBA 331 (2004).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Whether property with predominantly nonfarm soils should nevertheless be viewed as "other lands suitable for farm use" under a county code standard that replicates the Goal 3 definition of agricultural land, is governed by specific considerations. That a property may have been briefly used as an elk and deer holding facility is not one of the specified considerations. Rutigliano v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 470 (2004).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. There is no generally applicable rule that in approving a land use proposal a local government must find that the proposal complies with state permitting requirements or that it is feasible for the proposal to comply with state permitting requirements. Paddock v. Yamhill County, 45 Or LUBA 39 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings that explain that a property's locational characteristics are ideal to support airport-related light industrial uses and that other properties located within city limits are not as well suited for those uses are adequate to explain why an annexation is consistent with city annexation policies that require a demonstration that the annexation is "needed." Just v. City of Lebanon, 45 Or LUBA 162 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A hearings officer may rely on a staff memorandum to conclude an approval criterion is met, provided (1) the decision clearly identifies the staff memorandum relied upon; and (2) the memorandum adequately sets out the relevant approval criterion and explain the facts relied upon to reach the ultimate conclusion that the standard is satisfied. Frazee v. Jackson County, 45 Or LUBA 263 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings that do not address arguments made at the local level that the chosen study area is not reflective of the actual land use pattern of the area are not adequate to satisfy the stability standard set out in OAR 660-033-0130(4)(a)(D). Frazee v. Jackson County, 45 Or LUBA 263 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Testimony from fruit growers that a fruit processing facility provides a market for their fruit and, as a result, provides incentive to those growers to continue their agricultural operations and a condition of approval that requires the operator of the fruit processing facility to grow fruit on its property that will be processed at the facility is sufficient to establish that the proposed fruit processing facility will enhance the farming enterprises of the local agricultural community. Hiebenthal v. Polk County, 45 Or LUBA 297 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Remand to adopt specific findings addressing a local criterion requiring that comprehensive plan amendments be "in the public interest and will be of general public benefit" is not warranted where the findings and narrative text of the amendments make it abundantly clear that the local government believes that the amendments are in the public interest and will benefit the public. City of Woodburn v. Marion County, 45 Or LUBA 423 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A hearings officer's erroneous finding that land is currently employed for nursery stock production is harmless error, where petitioners do not establish that nursery stock production must precede issuance of a permit that is necessary to construct an accessory greenhouse. Lorenz v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 635 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A city's error in failing to applying an applicable criterion in the manner contemplated by an appellate decision is harmless if the city's alternative findings addressing the applicable criterion are consistent with the appellate decision and are adequate. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 44 Or LUBA 308 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A city's finding that none of the proposed units in a proposed 62-unit assisted living facility will have kitchen facilities and therefore each unit should not be considered an individual "housing unit" for the purposes of a housing density standard is inadequate, where there is evidence that administrative rules governing assisted living facilities require kitchen facilities in every unit, and the city's findings do not address those administrative rules. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 44 Or LUBA 308 (2003).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where the meaning of an approval standard is ambiguous and disputed during local proceedings, an unexplained conclusion that the standard is met is inadequate to supply the findings required by ORS 215.416(9). Underhill v. Wasco County, 43 Or LUBA 277 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A finding that a proposed Head Start program is not a school is inadequate, where it does not answer the relevant the question under the code, which is whether the proposed use is a "public building." Oregon Child Devel. Coalition v. City of Madras, 43 Or LUBA 184 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local approval criterion requires a finding that a proposed use will have a minimal adverse impact on surrounding uses compared to the impact of development permitted outright, a city may not limit its impact analysis to only one permitted use, where other permitted uses in the zone may have impacts similar to those of the proposed use. Oregon Child Devel. Coalition v. City of Madras, 43 Or LUBA 184 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local approval criterion requires a finding that a proposed use will "preserve assets of particular interest in the community," a city council's finding that the proposed use does not satisfy the criterion is inadequate where the finding merely sets out a series of concerns about the proposed use without explaining why those concerns are "assets of particular interest" that the proposed use will not preserve. Oregon Child Devel. Coalition v. City of Madras, 43 Or LUBA 184 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A standard that imposes both an analytical requirement and an ultimate legal standard that public services be adequate to accommodate a proposed zone change is not satisfied by a conclusion that the ultimate legal standard is met, if the required analysis has not been conducted. Fay v. City of Portland, 43 Or LUBA 390 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A county's findings regarding the infeasibility of locating a radio transmission tower on either of two city-owned lots are adequate where the findings parallel an earlier memorandum in the record regarding one of the tax lots, and that earlier memorandum addresses the infeasibility of the other tax lot, notwithstanding the county's failure to recite specific aspects of the memorandum addressing the second tax lot. Van Nalts v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 497 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Read together with OAR 731-015-0075(7)'s express requirement for findings adequate to establish that a proposal complies with an affected local government's comprehensive plan, the OAR 731-015-0075(2) requirement for more extensive findings if the proposal requires comprehensive plan amendments cannot be interpreted to mean that only cursory findings are needed where no comprehensive plan amendments are required. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings that merely assert that a property is better suited for rural residential use than for farm use are inadequate to support a reasons exception under OAR 660-004-0020 and 660-004-0022. DLCD v. Yamhill County, 42 Or LUBA 126 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where it is unclear who would own a proposed "personal use airport" in an EFU zone, and whether the uses that the owner plans to make of the airport would be consistent with the uses allowed under ORS 215.283(2)(h), the owner must be identified and the county's findings must explain why it concludes that the proposed uses fall within the uses allowed with a personal use airport. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Grant County, 42 Or LUBA 9 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A city council finding that corrects a local appellant's citation to a city code provision provides no basis for reversal or remand where the correction has no effect on the city council's disposition of the merits of the local appellant's challenge. Sattler v. City of Beaverton, 41 Or LUBA 295 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A petitioner's challenge to a finding because it is more responsive to one code criterion than to another provides no basis for reversal or remand where the city's findings as a whole show that both criteria have been met. Sattler v. City of Beaverton, 41 Or LUBA 295 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a hearings official adopts detailed findings concerning the nature of the "surroundings" in applying a local approval criterion that requires that a proposed use be compatible with its surroundings, geographic ambiguity about the outer reach of the "surroundings" that were considered by the hearings official will provide no basis for remand, where petitioners identify no uses that they believe fall within the relevant "surroundings" and were not considered by the hearings official. Knight v. City of Eugene, 41 Or LUBA 279 (2002).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where petitioner raises issues regarding whether a proposed site design complies with potentially applicable approval criteria, the local government's decision must respond by either (1) determining that the cited provisions are not applicable approval criteria or (2) demonstrating that the proposal complies with such provisions. Elliott v. City of Redmond, 40 Or LUBA 242 (2001).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In addressing an "adequate public facilities" zone change criterion, a county is not required to adopt findings specifically addressing every use allowed in the proposed commercial zone; more general findings may suffice. Where no party raises any issue concerning potential uses that may place more stringent demands on public facilities than the proposed use, the county may limit its consideration to the proposed use. Swyter v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 166 (2001).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a finding incorporates findings from elsewhere in the decision to address an approval criterion, but refers to a paragraph number that is not included in the decision, that error provides no basis for reversal or remand where it is obvious which findings the reference intended to incorporate. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A city's finding that the portion of a dwelling exceeding a code-mandated height limit adversely affects the ocean view of a neighboring property is supported by substantial evidence where the record includes photographs, a videotape and drawings that show the subject dwelling blocking the view of ocean water from the neighboring property, notwithstanding that the photographs, videotape and drawings show that the subject dwelling blocks only a tiny sliver of ocean water view. Rivera v. City of Bandon, 38 Or LUBA 736 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local code criterion that requires a county to consider comments and recommendations of adjacent and vicinity property owners does not require that the county adopt findings that address every comment or recommendation. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In reviewing findings adopted to support the imposition of exactions, LUBA first determines if any identified impacts or benefits are not relevant for the purposes of the rough proportionality analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). LUBA then looks at whether the remaining findings adequately quantify the benefits to the development or the impacts of the development on public facilities, and whether those findings suffice to demonstrate that the city's exactions are "roughly proportional" to those benefits and impacts. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In some cases, the impacts resulting from the development may be so great, and the exactions imposed so small, that it is readily apparent without additional explanation that the exactions are roughly proportional to the expected impact. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. The impacts resulting from the approval of two residential parcels are not so great as to make it self-evident that the imposition of a 20-foot dedication of right-of-way requirement is roughly proportional to the impacts of the proposed development. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Unless a local government makes some effort to quantify the benefits accruing to a particular development, those benefits will be of limited assistance in applying the rough proportionality analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a zoning ordinance standard requires that the transportation system be capable of serving the proposed and existing uses and the findings addressing that standard focus exclusively on the relatively small traffic generating impact of the proposal without ever addressing the adequacy of the transportation system, the findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with the standard. Hatfield v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 664 (2000).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings that express confidence that particular existing zoning districts could be applied to implement a conditional plan map amendment are legally irrelevant, where the decision to amend the zoning map to implement the new plan map designation is deferred to a later date. Neighbors for Livability v. City of Beaverton, 37 Or LUBA 408 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a party argues that the decision is supported by substantial evidence, but fails to identify where in the record that evidence is located, LUBA will not search the record for such evidence. DLCD v. Wallowa County, 37 Or LUBA 105 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where the local government's findings are based entirely on a faulty analysis of the evidence, LUBA will remand the decision to permit the local government to reweigh and review the evidence and adopt findings consistent with a correct analysis. Johnson v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 73 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In considering challenges to committed exception findings the question of whether the local government adopted the required findings addressing the characteristics of adjacent lands and the relationship between the exception area and adjacent lands is distinct from the question of whether the adopted findings demonstrate that uses allowed by Goal 3 are impracticable on the subject property. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Under OAR 660-004-0028(6)(c)(A), conflicts with rural residential development in exception areas created pursuant to applicable goals cannot be used to justify a committed exception on the subject property. A finding that a majority of nearby parcels were created before the statewide planning goals is insufficient to demonstrate compliance with this requirement. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. The requirement in OAR 660-004-0028(6)(c)(B) that "several contiguous undeveloped parcels" under one ownership shall be considered as one farm or forest operation does not require that a contiguous developed parcel be considered as part of contiguous farm operation. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. OAR 660-004-0028 does not require a finding that the characteristics of the proposed exception area are sufficient in and of themselves to commit the property to nonresource use. All factors in the rule must be considered, including the characteristics of the adjacent lands. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999). (1999)

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A county's conclusory finding that goals protecting housing are not violated by rezoning rural residential property for industrial use because proximity of the property to commercial and industrial uses and an interstate highway makes use of the property for rural residential uses impracticable is inadequate, where the record includes no evidence of conflicts with those uses that might make rural residential uses impracticable. James v. Josephine County, 35 Or LUBA 493 (1999).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a county's land use decision approving a forest template dwelling consists of a single-page form that contains blanks for the subject property's legal description, zoning, size and the names and addresses of the applicant and any representatives plus signature lines, the decision is not supported by adequate findings. Krieger v. Wallowa County, 35 Or LUBA 305 (1998).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A city's failure to adopt findings specifically addressing a plan criterion is not error where the substance of the plan policy is addressed in the city's findings. Hannah v. City of Eugene, 35 Or LUBA 1 (1998) (1998).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings concerning the size and density of a proposal which simply cite to assessor's records as the basis for the findings are not supported by substantial evidence, where the record does not include the assessor's records or any other evidence that supports the findings. Johnston v. City of Albany, 34 Or LUBA 32 (1998).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A finding need not include an express interpretive statement about the meaning of a code standard as long as the local government's interpretation of the standard can be discerned from the way the standard is applied. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 33 Or LUBA 613 (1997).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where visual impact, noise and safety issues are relevant to compliance with applicable standards and are raised by petitioner below, the local government must adequately address those issues, and conclusory findings unsupported by substantial evidence are inadequate. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 613 (1997).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. ORS 197.835(11)(b) allows LUBA to overlook minor defects in local government findings when substantiating evidence makes the local government's decision obvious or inevitable; it does not authorize LUBA to disregard the local government's actual findings or to read into those findings language that is not stated. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Under ORS 197.835(11)(b), LUBA is authorized to review the findings and conclusions made by the governing body and correct minor oversights or omissions; however, the county's unexplained and unsupported determination of compliance with applicable criteria is not a minor oversight, and LUBA will not analyze the record and substantiate the county's conclusions. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Contrary to the contention that limited land use decisions require only cursory findings, ORS 227.173(2), which states the requirement for findings in support of a city permit approval, makes no distinction between land use decision findings and limited land use decision findings. Design Home Construction v. City of Silverton, 32 Or LUBA 452 (1997).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where evidence identified in the city's brief clearly supports a finding that a proposed development will not significantly affect a transportation facility, LUBA will affirm that part of the city's decision under ORS 197.835(9), notwithstanding the city's failure to make the required finding. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where the local code requires that certain "factors" be considered, a finding that the subject property is located in a school district is not responsive to the factor "school district service capability," because the finding says nothing about the capability of the school district to serve the proposed development. McNamara v. Union County, 28 Or LUBA 396 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. In addressing a code requirement concerning visual impacts, a local government is not required to establish that every condition imposed will mitigate all visual impacts. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local government adopts a number of different findings addressing a code standard requiring protection of the visual character of the area, and petitioners challenge some but not all of those findings, but make no attempt to explain why the findings taken as a whole are inadequate, petitioners provide no basis for reversal or remand. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where petitioners challenge planning commission findings addressing a standard requiring that the proposed use not force a significant change in farm or forest practices on adjoining lands, but do not challenge findings adopted by the county court which go beyond the planning commission findings, petitioners fail to provide a basis for reversal or remand. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local government decision maker may adopt staff-prepared findings as its own. That the planner who prepared the findings later advised the decision maker the findings are erroneous does not establish that the findings in fact are erroneous. Gettman v. City of Bay City, 28 Or LUBA 116 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A planning director's decision that a development has satisfied the requirements of local ordinances is inadequate for review if it does not identify which provisions of the ordinances it addresses, does not set out the facts relied on, and does not relate the facts to the ordinance provisions addressed. Hart v. Jefferson County, 27 Or LUBA 612 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A finding that simply states the farm management plan submitted by an applicant for farm dwelling approval meets the local code's definition of "commercial farm" is impermissibly conclusory. Kunze v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 130 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where petitioners contend the challenged decision does not demonstrate compliance with an applicable comprehensive plan policy, but fail to explain how the findings adopted by the local government addressing that policy are inadequate, LUBA will reject their contention. Dorgan v. City of Albany, 27 Or LUBA 64 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings which simply discuss public facilities and how they will be provided are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with a code requirement that a proposed planned unit development have "no greater demand on public facilities and services than other authorized uses for the land." DLCD v. Crook County, 26 Or LUBA 478 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where findings do not directly address the question of the level of public facilities necessary to serve a proposed 120-lot planned unit development on EFU-zoned land, those findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with plan policies implementing Goals 11 and 14, which require that public facilities be provided on such rural land "at levels appropriate for rural use only and should not support urban uses." DLCD v. Crook County, 26 Or LUBA 478 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where petitioners contend the challenged decision does not demonstrate compliance with an applicable approval standard, and the decision does not interpret the standard sufficiently for LUBA to review that interpretation and consider petitioners' arguments, LUBA will remand the decision to the local government. Bottum v. Union County, 26 Or LUBA 407 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local government fails to adopt findings identifying and applying applicable criteria, it is not possible for LUBA to perform its review function. Laine v. City of Rockaway Beach, 26 Or LUBA 417 (1994).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where petitioners contend the local government failed to adopt findings addressing standards that appear to be relevant to the challenged decision, and the challenged decision includes only a conclusory statement that applicants have adequately demonstrated compliance with such standards, LUBA will remand the decision for lack of adequate findings. Cummings v. Tillamook County, 26 OR LUBA 139 (1993).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a comprehensive plan provides that a four minute response time is critical for certain types of emergencies, a conclusion that a three to five minute response time for emergency vehicles is adequate to comply with the plan is inadequate to establish compliance with the plan. Langford v. City of Eugene, 26 Or LUBA 60 (1993).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Findings supporting approval of a PUD that determine there are solutions available to various landslide, drainage and related problems affecting the subject property, and that those solutions are possible, likely and reasonably certain to succeed, are adequate to establish that the local government did not improperly defer compliance with relevant PUD standards. Corbett/Terwilliger Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 601 (1993).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. An expression of belief that a local code standard imposing a specific decibel limitation will not be violated is not an adequate finding of compliance with that standard. Expressions by the applicant's attorney that noise generated by the proposed use will not be excessive or violate the standard are not substantial evidence that the standard will be met. Weuster v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 425 (1993).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Local code requirements that floodplain alterations for a driveway be in the public interest and meet some public need or public convenience are satisfied by determinations that (1) there is a public need for, and public interest in, the provision of housing; (2) the subject property is zoned for residential use; and (3) there is a need for, and a public interest in, the provision of access to the property to enable residential use. Clarke v. City of Hillsboro, 25 Or LUBA 195 (1993).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Allegations that amount to no more than a disagreement with the ultimate conclusion reached by the local government in its findings, provide no basis for reversal or remand of the challenged decision. McGowan v. City of Eugene, 24 Or LUBA 540 (1993).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Adequate findings enable participants in local government land use proceedings to understand the basis for the local government's decision and to determine whether an appeal is warranted. Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 251 (1992).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. Where a local government adopts findings specifically addressing an approval standard, petitioners may not fail to challenge the adequacy of the local government's findings, or their evidentiary support, and simply allege reasons why they believe the standard might be violated. Mercer v. Josephine County, 23 Or LUBA 608 (1992).

1.4.1 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Generally. A local code requirement for findings of preliminary PUD or subdivision plan feasibility does not require the kind of certainty or supporting evidence that may ultimately be required for approval of final construction plans. Bartels v. City of Portland, 23 Or LUBA 182 (1992).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. According to the "law of the case" pursuant to Beck v. City of Tillamook, 313 Or 148, 831 P2d 678 (1992), matters conclusively resolved before LUBA cannot be relitigated in subsequent appeals of subsequent decisions on the same matter. However, that principle is not violated where (1) LUBA remands to the county to adopt new findings, based on substantial evidence, and (2) on remand, the county accepts new evidence and adopts new findings, as LUBA directed. Where LUBA's original decision discussed certain requirements to provide guidance and framework on remand, and some of the county's findings are still insufficient on remand does not mean that the county violated the "law of the case." Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or 171 (2019).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. On remand, where LUBA instructed the county to resolve whether the project applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation" for purposes of applying for an accessory farm dwelling for a relative, LUBA established that certain findings and evidence are necessary to establish compliance with OAR 660-033-0130(9). The county's findings fall short of establishing that the applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation," because it is an undefined term, and it is the county's obligation to attempt to articulate the thresholds that separate a "commercial" from a non-commercial farming operation, and to determine those thresholds in the first instance. Although the county has some discretion to determine the thresholds, that determination will necessarily constitute a mixed question of fact and law, subject to LUBA's review for legal error and evidentiary sufficiency. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or 171 (2019).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. The focus of OAR 660-033-0130(9) and county code that implements it regarding whether the "farm operator * * * continue[s] to play the predominant role in the management and farm use of the farm," is on the farm operator's involvement in farm operations on the subject property, not on off-farm businesses that may relate to the farm operation. The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses do not help establish any element of OAR 660-033-0130(9). The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses are relevant to establishing the elements of OAR 660-033-0130(9) only in so much as the time spent on those businesses and away from the farm operation might undermine the claim that the farm operator will continue to play the "predominant role" in the farm operation and requires assistance in running the farm operation. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or 171 (2019).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a local government adopts independent findings and applies a different substantive analysis for two separate approval criteria, but relies on the same evidence in concluding that those criteria are not met, a petitioner does not effectively challenge the findings for one of those criteria by challenging the findings for the other so as to defeat an argument that it has failed to challenge all valid, alternative, and independent bases for denial. Himmelberger v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 367 (2019).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. When and if a board of county commissioners adopts a revised staff report as its findings, it must identify the applicable standards, the facts used to meet those standards and explain how those facts led to the conclusion that the applicable criteria has been met. Simply adopting the report or incorporating the applicant's burden of proof statement is not sufficient to serve as support for adequate findings. VanSickle v. Klamath County, 78 Or LUBA 56 (2018).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. When a county has evaluated facts, evidence, and argument in the record in reaching its decision and adopted findings in support of its decision, it is not necessary for the county to incorporate specific documents as findings. Wachal v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 227 (2018).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A city council's findings that a master plan design guideline to "[d]evelop buildings that are appropriately scaled to the neighborhood," is met by a proposal to build a seven-story apartment building with a five-story wing rather than a four-story wing, representing a proposal to increase the building height by 10 feet, where surrounding buildings range in height from three to seven stories, is not in error. Such a finding is sufficient to satisfy city's local ordinance which requires a finding that under a proposed modification "[t]he resulting development will better meet the applicable design guidelines," and that "[o]n balance the proposal will be consistent with the purpose of the standard modified" where the 10-foot modification represents a trade-off for a clipped corner which allows for increased pedestrian access and sunlight into a proposed public square. Michaelson v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 504 (2018).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A city council's comparative approach of evaluating all design changes related to a proposed development modification at once to determine whether the resulting development better meets applicable guidelines, is not error. The nature of design review often involves tradeoffs and balancing between design features to achieve a more optimal overall design under the applicable guidelines. Michaelson v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 504 (2018).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. LUBA will deny an assignment of error that argues that an application fails to comply with provisions of a neighboring city's municipal code where the provisions of the neighboring city's code do not apply to the application. Martin v. City of Central Point, 74 Or LUBA 312 (2016).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. To address a historic design standard requiring that new construction be "compatible with the appearance and character of the historic district," the decision-maker is not required to reference the description of the appearance and character of a historic district included in the nomination to the federal historic register, but that description is a relevant and convenient source. Because the decision-maker must base the compatibility analysis on something, unless the decision-maker duplicates some of the descriptive work in the federal register nomination, there may be no practical substitute for considering the federal register nomination. Kliewer v. City of Bend, 73 Or LUBA 321 (2016).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A finding that development will have no "significant" adverse impacts on estuarine resources does not indicate that the decision maker misunderstood the applicable test under Goal 16, Implementation Requirement 1, which is focused on evaluation of "potential" adverse impacts, where other findings address the potential for adverse impacts. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings are inadequate to explain why fire protection standards are met where the findings do not address whether the standards are met or why the evidence in the record supports a conclusion that it is feasible to meet the standards, particularly where the only evidence in the record is that the fire district is concerned about wildfires and will perform the required inspections. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 368 (2014).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings are inadequate to explain why the hearings officer concluded that a proposed aggregate operation will not force a significant change in or significantly increase the cost of accepted farming practices where the decision fails to consider whether the standard is met but rather relies on a determination that a haul road that opponents argue will force a significant change in farming practices was authorized in previous decisions. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 368 (2014).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. In approving a final planned unit development (PUD), where the hearings officer defers for a second time a determination that a tentative PUD complies with geotechnical requirements to subsequent building and site development permit stages, such a deferral runs afoul of Gould v. Deschutes County, 216 Or App 150, 162, 171 P3d 1017 (2007), because those development stages are not infused with the same participatory rights as the Tentative PUD approval phase or the Final PUD approval phase. Willamette Oaks LLC v. City of Eugene, 64 Or LUBA 24 (2011).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A finding that a proposed stormwater drainage facility complies with applicable criteria in the city's Stormwater Master Plan is inadequate, where the findings do not identify the "criteria" in the Master Plan or explain why they are satisfied. Soares v. City of Corvallis, 56 Or LUBA 551 (2008).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Demonstrating that a land use proposal satisfies relevant approval criteria, because there are "feasible solutions to identified problems" regarding those approval criteria, requires some explanation of what those feasible solutions are. If that explanation that explanation of feasible solutions is provided, it is an adequate substitute for a more direct or precise finding that the approval criterion is satisfied, and the choice among those feasible solutions can occur in a technical or administrative review process, without additional public hearings. Gould v. Deschutes County, 54 Or LUBA 205 (2007).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. When a code provision regarding riparian corridors could plausibly be required to be satisfied at the stage of the challenged decision or at a later stage, the issue was raised below, and the decision does not address the issue, the decision must be remanded for the local government to address the issue. Coquille Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Coquille, 53 Or LUBA 186 (2006).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A county's interpretation that a comprehensive plan policy, which implements Statewide Planning Goal 7 (Natural Disasters and Hazards), requires regulation of development in known areas potentially subject to natural disasters and is aimed at reducing risks to life and property that are caused by natural hazards, is not applicable in the context of a determination whether development is appropriate in a beaches and dunes area, pursuant to a comprehensive plan policy that implements Statewide Planning Goal 18 (Beaches and Dunes), which is aimed at reducing impacts that may be caused by the proposed development. Borton v. Coos County, 52 Or LUBA 46 (2006).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings supporting a variance approval are not inadequate merely because they do not quote verbatim the applicable approval criteria; petitioners must explain how the "summary" of the applicable provision makes the findings inadequate or how the city misapplied the criteria. Spooner v. City of Salem, 51 Or LUBA 237 (2006).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A finding that land is not subject to Goal 3 is inadequate, where it does not address the definition of "agricultural land" at OAR 660-033-0020(1) or explain why land with Class III agricultural soils is not "agricultural land" under that definition. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Coos County, 50 Or LUBA 444 (2005).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings supporting a zone change are inadequate where they fail to address portions of the applicable approval criterion because the findings misquote the applicable zone change approval criterion, omitting language that refers to needed housing and requires that added emphasis be given to the comprehensive plan's housing policies. Premier Development v. City of McMinnville, 50 Or LUBA 666 (2005).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where the relevant legal standards mandate a regimented step-by-step analysis, and the findings adopted in support of a decision to deny a permit under those legal standards are brief and do not come close to providing the level of detail that is required to address the legal standards, remand is required. Hellberg v. Morrow County, 49 Or LUBA 423 (2005).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where notice of the hearing on an application for a variance from required setback lists as an approval criterion the code provision from which applicants seek the variance, the code provision does not thereby become an applicable approval criterion, and the county's failure to adopt findings addressing it is not a basis for reversal or remand. Papadopoulos v. Benton County, 48 Or LUBA 600 (2005).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a planning department finds that a proposed home occupation would violate two of twelve home occupation standards and following a local appeal a hearings official finds the proposed home occupation would not violate those two standards, assignments of error in a LUBA appeal of the hearings official decision that allege the home occupation would violate other standards that neither the planning department nor the hearings official considered provide no basis for reversal or remand, where the petitioners cite no legal authority that would compel the hearings official to render a complete adjudication concerning all home occupation standards. Revoal v. City of Eugene, 47 Or LUBA 136 (2004).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A blanket finding that "many" of the plan policies cited by opponents are not applicable mandatory approval criteria is inadequate to provide a reviewable interpretation or determination that a particular plan policy is inapplicable, especially when the decision imposes conditions that appear to be directed at the policy's requirements. Chin v. City of Corvallis, 46 Or LUBA 1 (2003).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A city's findings are adequate where they address each of the applicable criteria in its tree removal ordinance and explain why the certified arborist's report submitted by the subdivision applicant satisfies each of those criteria. Miller v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 536 (2004).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a city interprets a site design approval criterion as not requiring a demonstration that adequate facilities are available to serve the proposed development, the city does not err in failing to adopt findings to address arguments presented by opponents that facilities are not adequate. Durham v. City of Philomath, 45 Or LUBA 648 (2003).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Given the similarity between a code provision requiring preservation of "existing landscape features and amenities" "to the greatest extent possible," and another code provision requiring preservation of "significant trees and vegetation" " to the maximum extent practicable," a city does not err in interpreting one provision to be satisfied by findings addressing the other. Bagnell v. City of Corvallis, 44 Or LUBA 284 (2003).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A proposal to swap plan designations for two portions of a single parcel does not require separate findings addressing each portion, where the applicable plan amendment criteria do not necessarily require separate findings, and petitioner does not identify any meaningful difference between the two areas that would require separate consideration. Excelsior Investment Co. v. City of Medford, 44 Or LUBA 553 (2003).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a county considers dust impacts from mining that may have an impact on neighboring residential uses, those dust impacts may form a basis for denial only if the impacts violate applicable Department of Environmental Quality air quality standards. Morse Bros., Inc. v. Linn County, 42 Or LUBA 484 (2002).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A finding that recreational zoning may be applied to land that is subject to a physically developed exception for industrial uses because some of the uses allowed in an industrial zone may also be allowed in a recreation zone is not responsive to OAR 660-004-0018(2)(a), which requires that the zoning designation must "limit uses, density and public facilities and services to those which are the same as the existing land uses on the exception site." Doty v. Coos County, 42 Or LUBA 103 (2002).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings that conclude that a proposed recreational zoning designation will not permit urban uses on rural land because (1) the anticipated use of the property is allowed in the county's recreation zone, which is acknowledged as a rural zone, and (2) density is limited to the land's "carrying capacity," are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with OAR 660-004-0018(2)(b)(A) because acknowledgement of a zone as being generally in compliance with Goal 14 does not mean that all uses that may be approved under that zone are necessarily rural in nature. Doty v. Coos County, 42 Or LUBA 103 (2002).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings that assume that a proposed recreation use will be less intensive than the former industrial uses but do not address the diverse impacts that could result from recreational use of the property are inadequate to satisfy OAR 660-004-0018(2)(b)(B) and (C) because the uses are dissimilar and result in different impacts on adjacent and nearby resource land. Doty v. Coos County, 42 Or LUBA 103 (2002).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a county considers the impacts that a proposed rezoning would have on inventoried Goal 5 resources, and concludes that the existing Goal 5 protection program continues to be adequate to protect those resources, the county's conclusion satisfies Goal 5. Doty v. Coos County, 42 Or LUBA 103 (2002).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings that address certain rural residential locational criteria in the county's comprehensive plan are inadequate to address the specific requirements of OAR 660-004-0028(6), where the locational criteria do not implement the rule and bear no obvious relationship to the rule's requirements. Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 41 Or LUBA 358 (2002).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. LUBA will remand a decision denying an application to place and remove fill in a riparian zone, where the findings do not independently address the relevant standards and it is not clear what evidence the hearings officer relied on to apply the standards. Griffin v. Jackson County, 41 Or LUBA 159 (2001).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Petitioners' argument that a particular standard is not applicable to their application provides no basis for reversal or remand where it is obvious from the decision that the decision maker did not consider or apply that standard. Griffin v. Jackson County, 41 Or LUBA 159 (2001).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A city's interpretation that a state highway is not subject to city road design standards for streets providing access to a proposed subdivision is not clearly wrong, and is entitled to deference under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Costanzo v. City of Grants Pass, 40 Or LUBA 471 (2001).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A city does not err in determining that a code provision requiring that roads providing access to a proposed subdivision be paved to city standards is satisfied by a state highway that is paved to state standards. Costanzo v. City of Grants Pass, 40 Or LUBA 471 (2001).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a city code requires that alternative local access designs be examined and that the design chosen "best balances needs for economy, safety, efficiency and environmental compatibility," and the city's decision includes findings addressing specific environmental, traffic and safety impacts of the alternative access designs and explains why the chosen design avoids those impacts, the findings are adequate to address the criterion. Costanzo v. City of Grants Pass, 40 Or LUBA 471 (2001).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a variance criterion requires that a variance conform to the comprehensive plan, a city's finding that a variance will promote in-fill and higher residential density is insufficient to demonstrate that the variance, allowing a lot to be divided into two lots, satisfies that criterion where the findings identify no comprehensive plan provisions encouraging in-fill and higher residential density. Reagan v. City of Oregon City, 39 Or LUBA 672 (2001).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a county code provision specifically requires findings documenting whether there is a need for additional land for a particular purpose and whether the timing is appropriate to rezone land for that purpose, but the county interprets the code provision to not require documentation of the need and timing elements in a particular instance, that interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the provision and "clearly wrong." Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 357 (2000).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A local code criterion that requires a county to consider comments and recommendations of adjacent and vicinity property owners does not require that the county adopt findings that address every comment or recommendation. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where the county approves a golf course expansion without adopting findings addressing a comprehensive plan provision that prohibits approval of urban uses outside urban growth boundaries, LUBA will remand the decision so that the county can adopt findings addressing whether the subject golf course is "urban" and whether the proposed expansion of the golf course is consistent with the comprehensive plan provision. DLCD v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 88 (1999).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A specific finding of feasibility regarding an approval criterion is not satisfied by a general finding of overall feasibility, where a number of problems and conflicts were identified during the local proceedings concerning the particular approval criterion. Tenly Properties Corp. v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 352 (1998).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A local government has not deferred compliance with mandatory approval criteria where it grants tentative subdivision approval with the condition that development plans be reviewed by a geotechnical engineer prior to the issuance of construction permits. Once a local government has determined that compliance with a mandatory criterion is feasible, it may impose conditions of approval to ensure compliance with that criterion. No hearing on the geotechnical report is required. Property Rights and Owners, Ltd. v. City of Salem, 34 Or LUBA 258 (1998).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. The county's finding that the same level of public facilities and services that will be available to the subject property is presently available to all the surrounding land is not helpful to a determination of compliance with Goals 11 and 14 where the finding does not explain whether or how the goals were applied to the surrounding properties. Brown v. Jefferson County, 33 Or LUBA 418 (1997).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. The county's findings of compliance with applicable criteria are inadequate where they do not identify the relevant approval standards, set out the facts relied upon, or explain how the facts lead to the conclusion that applicable standards are satisfied. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where, on remand, an applicant modifies a site plan for a gas station and car wash so that only the location of the gas pumps is carried forward from the original site plan to the modified site plan, a reasonable person could not conclude that the two plans are substantially similar. A finding that the plans are substantially similar does not adequately address the code requirements that apply to a site plan. Sullivan v. City of Woodburn, 33 Or LUBA 356 (1997).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. The county's findings classifying livestock sales and shows as a "farm use" rather than as "stockyard and animal sales" are inadequate when the challenged decision does not relate the general findings to the property at issue, and therefore does not establish that the proposed use complies with the approval standards. Collins v. Klamath County, 32 Or LUBA 338 (1997).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. The county fails to establish that, under local code, a second dwelling is authorized as a conditional use in an EFU zone where the findings do not explain why the proposed dwelling is authorized and do not explain when the primary dwelling was established or whether its use is resource-related. Le Roux v. Malheur County, 32 Or LUBA 124 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings are inadequate to establish that a proposed use does or can satisfy the definition of "light industrial business" when there are no factual findings regarding the number of employees necessary for the proposed use. Miller v. City of Joseph, 31 Or LUBA 472 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where the city's zoning code requires a structure or use be lawfully existing at the time the ordinance making it nonconforming was adopted, the city may not find an existing use to be nonconforming until it determines, based on substantial evidence, that the use was lawfully existing at the time the ordinance making it nonconforming was adopted. Smith v. City of Phoenix, 31 Or LUBA 358 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. An operation that requires land for grazing horses employs that land for the production of livestock within the meaning of ORS 215.284(2)(b); therefore, a county errs when it concludes that consideration of the potential use of a parcel for grazing horses is not required in determining whether the parcel is generally unsuitable for farm use. Moore v. Coos County, 31 Or LUBA 347 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where LUBA remanded a previous appeal because the county did not apply relevant agricultural goal and implementation policies of its comprehensive plan, the county's conclusion on remand that its previous findings were sufficient is not adequate. Brown v. Coos County, 31 Or LUBA 142 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A local decision is subject to reversal, rather than remand, when the local government cannot demonstrate compliance with an applicable approval criterion. When a significant factual issue remains, the resolution of which could determine whether compliance is possible, the decision must be remanded. DLCD v. Clatsop County, 31 Or LUBA 90 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A finding that the county cooperated with certain state agencies by providing them with notice and an invitation to participate in local proceedings satisfies a plan requirement of cooperation with the agencies "to obtain more information." Furler v. Curry County, 31 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A local government's design review approval for a proposed apartment complex must be remanded where it does not contain findings that address relevant approval standards relating to open space and recreation, and does not address issues raised in the proceedings below that are relevant to compliance with those standards. Winkler v. City of Cottage Grove, 30 Or LUBA 351 (1996).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. When a challenged decision does not contain findings related to specific approval criteria, LUBA cannot perform its review function. Le Roux v. Malheur County, 30 Or LUBA 268 (1995).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A local government is not required to make findings to address criteria that it has found to be inapplicable. East Lancaster Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Salem, 30 Or LUBA 147 (1995).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. ORS 227.173(2) does not require a local government to make findings regarding criteria which could support approval of an application, or to make findings regarding criteria upon which it did not rely in reaching its decision to deny an application. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 30 Or LUBA 85 (1995).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. That a subdivision may have detrimental effects on adjacent property does not compel a finding that the variance which makes the subdivision possible will itself have such detrimental effects. Williams v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 5 (1995).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A petitioner's statement that certain road improvement conditions, which are imposed prior to subdivision and variance approvals, are "inherently unfair and biased" provides no basis for reversal or remand if the petitioner states no legal standards that such conditions violate. Williams v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 5 (1995).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings supporting a local government determination that an existing use is lawful are inadequate if they do not interpret or apply relevant provisions of the local code and do not state the facts relied on by the local government. Penland v. Josephine County, 29 Or LUBA 213 (1995).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a local governing body's findings are unclear with regard to whether the local government interprets the provisions of the local code's unstable slopes overlay district as applicable to approval of a subdivision preliminary plat, the challenged decision does not contain an interpretation adequate for review and must be remanded. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 28 Or LUBA 263 (1994).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a local government decision identifies a number of comprehensive plan provisions as approval standards for a request to cut trees, it may not approve the request without adopting findings demonstrating that the application complies with the identified plan policies. Gettman v. City of Bay City, 28 Or LUBA 116 (1994).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A hearings officer's reliance on a dictionary definition of "in conjunction with" without providing the dictionary definition relied upon is harmless error, where it is apparent from the decision that the hearings officer interpreted the code term to require establishment of a customer/seller or seller/customer relationship between the proposed commercial use and timber and farm uses in the community. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Findings which do not identify the provisions of the statewide planning goals, comprehensive plan or local code that govern a challenged code amendment are inadequate to satisfy a local code requirement that all code amendments be supported by findings explaining why the amendment complies with any relevant plan, code and statewide planning goal requirements. Andrews v. City of Brookings, 27 Or LUBA 39 (1994).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where a state agency expresses concerns about the impacts of a proposed development on unstable sands and flora, the Goal 2 coordination obligation requires that a county address those concerns in its findings. Waugh v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 300 (1993).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. The determination of whether a nonforest dwelling will materially alter the stability of the overall land use pattern of the area requires a county to (1) select an area for consideration, (2) determine the resource uses in the selected area, and (3) determine the proposed nonresource dwelling will not materially alter the stability of the existing resource in the selected area. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. Where the challenged decision applies some design review standards to an application for conditional use permit approval, but fails to explain why other apparently applicable design review standards are inapplicable to the conditional use permit stage, the challenged decision must be remanded for the local government to adopt findings addressing the applicability of these other design review standards. Moore v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 40 (1993).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. A local government decision approving a permit will be remanded to the local government if the decision fails to (1) identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts believed and relied upon by the local decision maker, and (3) explain how those facts lead to a decision that the proposal complies with the approval standards. Lathrop v. Wallowa County, 25 Or LUBA 693 (1993).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. While ORS 215.416(9) does not require that findings include citations to, or verbatim quotes of, applicable approval standards, it does require that a reasonable person be able to determine from the local government's decision what it considered to be the relevant criteria and standards. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 312 (1993).

1.4.2 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. It is error for a local government to fail to identify the standards relevant to a development application in the challenged decision and to fail to justify its decision on the basis of compliance with those standards. Ruff v. Harney County, 23 Or LUBA 521 (1992).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings concluding that an aggregate quarry would be compatible with an adjacent grazing operation and periodic logging are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence without an explanation of the manner in which the grazing operation is run—for example, whether it is seasonal or includes accessory activities such as breeding or calving—and the nature of the periodic logging. Currie v. Douglas County, 81 Or LUBA 602 (2020).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings concluding that an aggregate quarry satisfies the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1) are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence where the county identifies grazing as the only surrounding farm or forest use but does not verify that the grazing operation is in fact limited to grazing, without other uses such as breeding, or establish that logging on the grazing property, government ownership of surrounding forest lands, or maintaining of surrounding forest land as a timber investment do not involve protected forest activity. Currie v. Douglas County, 81 Or LUBA 602 (2020).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. While applying pesticides and herbicides in a manner that causes overspray or drift onto adjoining properties is not an accepted farm practice for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), where the labels for some pesticides and herbicides effectively require a setback from certain sensitive uses regardless of whether drift or overspray occurs, a county will likely have to make specific factual findings about the specific setbacks required by particular chemicals on particular farming operations on surrounding farmlands, based on application methods, and whether the operation of each setback would force a significant change in farm practices. Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 348 (2019).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where an applicant proposes a planned development, and where a local code provision requires the local government to "seek to determine that the development * * * will not create a drainage or pollution problem outside the planned area," the local government errs by not adopting findings determining whether the construction of a road extension that is proposed as part of and that would provide access to the planned development will create a drainage or pollution problem outside the planned area. Lundeen v. City of Waldport, 80 Or LUBA 450 (2019).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. According to the "law of the case" pursuant to Beck v. City of Tillamook, 313 Or 148, 831 P2d 678 (1992), matters conclusively resolved before LUBA cannot be relitigated in subsequent appeals of subsequent decisions on the same matter. However, that principle is not violated where (1) LUBA remands to the county to adopt new findings, based on substantial evidence, and (2) on remand, the county accepts new evidence and adopts new findings, as LUBA directed. Where LUBA's original decision discussed certain requirements to provide guidance and framework on remand, and some of the county's findings are still insufficient on remand does not mean that the county violated the "law of the case." Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or 171 (2019).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. On remand, where LUBA instructed the county to resolve whether the project applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation" for purposes of applying for an accessory farm dwelling for a relative, LUBA established that certain findings and evidence are necessary to establish compliance with OAR 660-033-0130(9). The county's findings fall short of establishing that the applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation," because it is an undefined term, and it is the county's obligation to attempt to articulate the thresholds that separate a "commercial" from a non-commercial farming operation, and to determine those thresholds in the first instance. Although the county has some discretion to determine the thresholds, that determination will necessarily constitute a mixed question of fact and law, subject to LUBA's review for legal error and evidentiary sufficiency. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or 171 (2019).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The focus of OAR 660-033-0130(9) and county code that implements it regarding whether the "farm operator * * * continue[s] to play the predominant role in the management and farm use of the farm," is on the farm operator's involvement in farm operations on the subject property, not on off-farm businesses that may relate to the farm operation. The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses do not help establish any element of OAR 660-033-0130(9). The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses are relevant to establishing the elements of OAR 660-033-0130(9) only in so much as the time spent on those businesses and away from the farm operation might undermine the claim that the farm operator will continue to play the "predominant role" in the farm operation and requires assistance in running the farm operation. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or 171 (2019).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where a local government adopts independent findings and applies a different substantive analysis for two separate approval criteria, but relies on the same evidence in concluding that those criteria are not met, a petitioner does not effectively challenge the findings for one of those criteria by challenging the findings for the other so as to defeat an argument that it has failed to challenge all valid, alternative, and independent bases for denial. Himmelberger v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 367 (2019).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Applicable Standards. When and if a board of county commissioners adopts a revised staff report as its findings, it must identify the applicable standards, the facts used to meet those standards and explain how those facts led to the conclusion that the applicable criteria has been met. Simply adopting the report or incorporating the applicant's burden of proof statement is not sufficient to serve as support for adequate findings. VanSickle v. Klamath County, 78 Or LUBA 56 (2018).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. In considering whether property is generally unsuitable for farm use, it is not appropriate to disregard adjoining parcels as "nonfarm" parcels, simply because there is a nonfarm dwelling on the properties, where there is evidence those adjoining parcels have been planted in winter wheat. Without some findings addressing that evidence of farm use, findings that the property is generally unsuitable for farm use are not supported by substantial evidence. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Crook County, 77 Or LUBA 202 (2018).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings regarding the adequacy of urban services to serve annexed property are inadequate, where the findings cite only hearsay statements from providers, and fail to address issues raised below regarding delayed response times to service the subject property and an engineer's testimony that the electrical system cannot serve the property without impacting other portions of the city. J4J Misc PAC v. City of Jefferson, 75 Or LUBA 120 (2017).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied Upon. A county's finding that a site adjoining a golf fairway was "developed as a golf course" in 2001 is supported by substantial evidence, where the record includes evidence that the site was landscaped in a mix of rough and smooth terrain, and was considered a playable area, notwithstanding that the golf course later designated the site as outside the playable area. Kine v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 419 (2017).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. There is no general requirement that a city council discuss the evidence it chooses not to rely on and a city council's failure to discuss opposing evidence does not necessarily mean the city council did not consider that opposing evidence. Evans v. City of Bandon, 74 Or LUBA 418 (2016).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Imprecision in a hearings officer's findings regarding the distance between a proposed asphalt batch plant and a greenway and trail and neighboring mobile home park provides no basis for reversal or remand, where there is evidence in the record showing those proximities and the imprecision in the findings do not establish that the hearings officer was under any misapprehension about how close the asphalt batch plant would be to the mobile home park or greenway and trail. Meyer v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 1 (2016).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that efforts over the last 100 years to address landslide danger to water reservoirs have been "Herculean," is an expression of opinion, rather than a necessary finding of fact, and need not be supported by substantial evidence. Fernandez v. City of Portland, 73 Or LUBA 107 (2016).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where findings identify an applicable conditional use standard that requires that conditional uses must not impair permitted uses on surrounding property, but the decision includes no findings of fact or findings explaining why the decision maker believed proposed wind turbines satisfied that standard, remand is required for adequate findings. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. It will rarely be the case that an approval standard and the facts are such that it will suffice to quote the standard and conclude that the standard is met, without any further explanation. Where a use that is not listed as a permitted or conditional use in a zone may be approved if it is of the same character or has similar impacts as uses that are listed as permitted or conditional uses in the zone, and a proposed wind turbine has external moving parts that the listed uses do not, findings that simply quote the "same character or similar impacts" standard and conclude without any explanation that the standard is met, are inadequate. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Remand for more adequate findings is required where a historic design standard requires a finding that the relationship of new construction to the street and open space between buildings is compatible with the adjacent historic buildings and the historic character of the surrounding area, but the findings address only compliance with code setback requirements, and fail to identify or address compatibility with adjacent historic buildings and the historic character of the surrounding area. Kliewer v. City of Bend, 73 Or LUBA 321 (2016).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that the height of new construction is "similar" to dwellings within a historic district is insufficient to establish compliance with a standard requiring that new construction not exceed the height of historic buildings in the surrounding area, where the surrounding area includes both historic and non-historic buildings, and the findings do not identify what buildings the height is compared to, or find that the height of new construction does not exceed the height of the tallest historic building in the surrounding area. Kliewer v. City of Bend, 73 Or LUBA 321 (2016).

4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding of compliance with a zone change standard requiring consistency with a comprehensive plan policy requiring that higher density residential uses be sited "near employment" is inadequate, where the finding does not address proximity to employment at all, other than state that the property is adjacent to a small convenience commercial node. Kine v. City of Bend, 72 Or LUBA 423 (2015).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding of consistency with a comprehensive plan policy requiring that higher density residential use be sited in locations with "good access" to arterials is inadequate, where the finding states only that the site is located near an arterial, but without attempting to evaluate whether the site has or will in fact have good access to the arterial. Kine v. City of Bend, 72 Or LUBA 423 (2015).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that a proposed truck maintenance home occupation will comply with a 600-square-foot floor area limitation is inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence, where the findings do not address how much floor area employees will use in performing maintenance tasks, and there is no evidence in the record supporting a finding that the physical area occupied by trucks, tools, storage, and the area needed to perform maintenance tasks will occupy no more than 600 square feet. Stevens v. City of Island City, 71 Or LUBA 275 (2015).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A hearings official's failure to specifically refer in his findings to a letter submitted in support of an application during a prior phase of the local proceedings does not mean the hearings official's decision is not supported by substantial evidence. Teen Challenge v. Lane County, 67 Or LUBA 300 (2013).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. In denying a permit application, a hearings official need not specifically refer to a letter that was submitted in support of an application, where that letter was submitted after the evidentiary record closed and was specifically rejected by the hearings official because it was submitted late. Teen Challenge v. Lane County, 67 Or LUBA 300 (2013).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A hearings officer's finding that a proposed kennel operation is compatible with surrounding uses is inadequate and is not based on substantial evidence in the record, where the findings do not explain the basis for assuming that impacts from the noise and traffic associated with the kennel operation will be limited to the kennel's historic operating levels, and no condition of approval limits the operation to its historic levels. Butcher v. Washington County, 65 Or LUBA 263 (2012).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where the local government denies an application based on its conclusion that an applicant did not provide sufficient information, and the applicant submitted detailed information and studies regarding impacts to water quality, water flow, land stability and erosion, the findings are inadequate where they do not explain why the information that was submitted was not "sufficient." Tidewater Contractors v. Curry County, 65 Or LUBA 424 (2012).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Under a code variance standard that requires identification of exceptional or extraordinary circumstances applicable to the subject property that do not generally apply to other properties in the same zone, the decision-maker must conduct some fact-finding regarding circumstances on other properties in the same zone and compare those circumstances to those affecting the subject property. JCK Enterprises LLC v. City of Cottage Grove, 64 Or LUBA 142 (2011).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that the "location, size, design and operating characteristics" of a mixed-use development in a commercial zone will be compatible with surrounding properties are inadequate, where the findings do not describe any of the "operating characteristics" of the mixed-use development or evaluate whether those operating characteristics will be compatible with surrounding properties. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 64 Or LUBA 377 (2011).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that public facilities are adequate to accommodate the proposed conditional use, based on review of statements from the public works department and fire chief, is not supported by substantial evidence, where the record includes no statements from the public works department, and the fire chief's letter states that it is unknown whether the city water supply can accommodate the proposed use. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 64 Or LUBA 377 (2011).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings are inadequate to explain how a proposed waste water treatment facility on EFU land would either "force a significant change in" the adjacent farming practices or "significantly increase the cost of" an adjacent organic farming operation under ORS 215.296(1) where the findings do not explain what the "significant impacts" to the organic farming operation would be or explain how the potential for spray drift from the proposed facility would either "force a significant change in" the organic farm practices or "significantly increase the cost of" the operation. Falcon Heights WSD v. Klamath County, 64 Or LUBA 390 (2011).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where the evidence the county appears to rely on appears to show that state noise standards are violated by a wind energy facility at four residences, but the county only finds that the noise standards are violated at one residence, the decision must be remanded for additional findings. Mingo v. Morrow County, 63 Or LUBA 357 (2011).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. LUBA will remand for more adequate findings regarding a code requirement for "guaranteed access," where the local government relies upon a roadway easement on adjoining land that is not in the record and that arguably does not serve the subject property. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 60 Or LUBA 336 (2010).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where a county hearings officer's findings show she was persuaded that additional mitigation measures were necessary to address thermal impacts of destination resort groundwater use on a nearby cool water creek, the hearings officer's decision to accept the applicant's proposal to provide additional mitigation by reducing surface withdrawal from that cool water creek is inadequate where there was opposition testimony that the proposed mitigation would not mitigate the thermal impact. While there may be a simple answer to the opposition testimony, where that answer is missing in the record and the hearings officer's decision does not address that opposition testimony, the decision must be remanded. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A county's findings that rely on a single statement of a legislator that is a generalized statement about a large land use bill and not a statement directed at the meaning of the particular statute at issue is unpersuasive. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 58 Or LUBA 315 (2009).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that describe the only forest practice that adjoining timber operators identified as impacted by proposed mining on forest land are adequate for purposes of a code significant change/increase standard, where the code standard does not implement the statutory significant change/increase standard, and the petitioners do not explain why the code standard requires an exhaustive description of all forest practices on nearby lands. Comden v. Coos County, 56 Or LUBA 214 (2008).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. While a county's failure to describe accepted farming practices on nearby lands would likely require remand under the ORS 215.296(1) significant change/increase standard or a code provision implementing that standard, such a failure is not necessarily reversible error under a similar code significant change/increase standard that does not implement the statute. Any failure to describe accepted farming practices under the code standard is harmless, where the county adopted unchallenged findings, supported by substantial evidence, that the proposed mining will not significantly affect any farm or forest practices. Comden v. Coos County, 56 Or LUBA 214 (2008).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that simply states that an approval standard is satisfied "as shown in" the application and oral testimony, without any attempt to state the facts relied upon or explain why the facts demonstrate compliance with the standard, is inadequate. O'Rourke v. Union County, 54 Or LUBA 614 (2007).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Because ORS 215.422(1)(c) explicitly limits the appeal fee that counties can charge for certain land use appeals, evidence that total annual revenues produced by over 200 county fees fall short of total planning department annual expenses is not sufficient to demonstrate that the fees collected for three types of appeals comply with ORS 215.422(1)(c). A more particularized evidentiary effort to focus on the costs and expenses associated with the three types of appeals subject to ORS 215.422(1)(c) is required. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 52 Or LUBA 140 (2006).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where a county interprets its code to require submittal of expert studies to more precisely establish the boundary of a significant natural resource area, a hearings officer may consider expert studies from the applicant and opponents, accept and reject parts of both studies, and require protection of a natural resource area that is smaller than proposed by opponents and larger than proposed by the applicant. Kyle v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 399 (2006).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The fact that a local government could have reached the decision it did without considering and relying on improperly received evidence does not make that error harmless. When a local government relies on evidence not properly before it to render a decision, it violates the parties' substantial rights. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Oregon City, 50 Or LUBA 87 (2005).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where the relevant legal standards mandate a regimented step-by-step analysis, and the findings adopted in support of a decision to deny a permit under those legal standards are brief and do not come close to providing the level of detail that is required to address the legal standards, remand is required. Hellberg v. Morrow County, 49 Or LUBA 423 (2005).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that lands within a UGB are "unavailable" for a proposed public storage facility is inadequate, where the county fails to address evidence that there is a large surplus of vacant industrial and commercial lands within the UGB that allow public storage facilities, and there is no basis to conclude that such lands are not "available." Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 49 Or LUBA 529 (2005).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings are inadequate where they simply disagree with a hearings officer's interpretation of what an approval standard requires, without explaining what the decision maker believes the standard to require or why the evidence satisfies the standard. Knutson Family LLC v. City of Eugene, 48 Or LUBA 399 (2005).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that briefly describe existing parks within the city are inadequate to demonstrate that a proposed new park complies with a standard requiring that other properly zoned land is not available in sufficient quantity to meet current and projected needs. Nielson v. City of Stayton, 47 Or LUBA 52 (2004).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that proposed residential development is consistent with permitted uses in the zone are inadequate to demonstrate that the proposed development is compatible with the "existing land use pattern in the area." Doob v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 147 (2004).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Conclusory findings that proposed development is consistent with the current development pattern in the area are inadequate to demonstrate that the proposed development is "consistent with the character of the surrounding area," particularly when the local code calls for a "detailed review." Seaton v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 178 (2004).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. That lot-of-record dwellings are allowed in the EFU zone is an insufficient basis to demonstrate compliance with a code standard requiring that a proposed lot-of-record dwelling will not materially alter the stability of the land use pattern in the area. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. That lot-of-record dwellings are allowed in the EFU zone is an insufficient basis to demonstrate compliance with a code standard requiring a finding that the proposed dwelling will not create conditions or circumstances "contrary to the purposes or intent" of the county comprehensive plan and code. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that recite lengthy efforts by the city historic preservation board to encourage an applicant to preserve an historic building are adequate to show that the city met its obligations under a plan policy requiring the city to "encourage" preservation of historic structures. Chin v. City of Corvallis, 46 Or LUBA 1 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where a parking standard requires that parking "supply, operations and demand" be managed "to encourage economic vitality, traffic safety and livability of residential neighborhoods," a finding that additional parking that will be generated by a proposed rezoning is "negligible" is inadequate, where the finding does not explain what the local government means by the word "negligible" or why that increase will encourage economic vitality, traffic safety and livability, in the face of testimony that those attributes will be negatively affected by the proposal. Fay v. City of Portland, 46 Or LUBA 39 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The failure of a decision maker to list all of the evidence relied upon in making a decision is not necessarily fatal as long as the response brief directs LUBA to evidence in the record that supports the critical findings in the decision. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 101 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A city's findings are adequate where they address each of the applicable criteria in its tree removal ordinance and explain why the certified arborist's report submitted by the subdivision applicant satisfies each of those criteria. Miller v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 536 (2004).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where an approval standard requires a finding that a proposed use will have a "minimal adverse impact on property values," a finding that relies on a letter stating that the impact of a proposed use cannot be evaluated until the use has been established is not adequate to demonstrate that the standard is met. Gumtow-Farrior v. Crook County, 45 Or LUBA 612 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where an applicable approval criterion requires that a proposed use be considered to determine whether adequate public facilities are available to serve a property, a city's conclusion that the criterion is met is not adequate, where that conclusion is based on (1) prior less intensive use of the two parcels; and (2) system-wide capacity of the city's sewer and water facilities. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 44 Or LUBA 308 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. LUBA will remand a decision where petitioner identifies a discrepancy between the county zoning map and the map the county relied upon to approve a rezoning application, where the discrepancy may affect the county's determination that coastal shorelands are not affected by the rezoning, and the county's findings do not explain why the county did not rely on the county zoning map to establish the zoning boundary. Doty v. Coos County, 44 Or LUBA 448 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that a proposed destination resort is located in a setting with "high natural amenities" as required by ORS 197.445 is inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence, where neither the county's decision nor the record identifies or describes any high natural amenities near the proposed resort. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 44 Or LUBA 745 (2003).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A city's finding that a proposed use will place an "excessive burden on traffic" based on a conclusion that the applicant failed to provide a traffic study that estimated the number of vehicles that would use local streets is inadequate, where there is a trip generation study in the record that provides the evidence the finding states is missing. Oregon Child Devel. Coalition v. City of Madras, 43 Or LUBA 184 (2002).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A county's findings regarding the infeasibility of locating a radio transmission tower on either of two city-owned lots are adequate where the findings parallel an earlier memorandum in the record regarding one of the tax lots, and that earlier memorandum addresses the infeasibility of the other tax lot, notwithstanding the county's failure to recite specific aspects of the memorandum addressing the second tax lot. Van Nalts v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 497 (2002).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that a proposed underground shooting range cannot be detected by sight, smell or sound from adjacent residential property are adequate to explain why the proposed shooting range is compatible with adjacent property. Chilla v. City of North Bend, 41 Or LUBA 539 (2002).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where a petitioner does not explain why approval criteria for fill in a floodplain and coastal shoreland necessitated precise delineation of the floodplain boundaries and precise knowledge about the location, amount and nature of the fill, the local government's failure to precisely delineate and describe the floodplain and fill provides no basis for remand. Willhoft v. City of Gold Beach, 41 Or LUBA 130 (2001).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where a city code requires that alternative local access designs be examined and that the design chosen "best balances needs for economy, safety, efficiency and environmental compatibility," and the city's decision includes findings addressing specific environmental, traffic and safety impacts of the alternative access designs and explains why the chosen design avoids those impacts, the findings are adequate to address the criterion. Costanzo v. City of Grants Pass, 40 Or LUBA 471 (2001).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Failure to specifically describe the grazing practices on surrounding properties does not render a finding of compliance with the noninterference standard inadequate where the proposed nonfarm dwelling is one-half mile from the nearest grazing operation and buffered by a number of vacant lots, and no conceivable interference is identified. Wolverton v. Crook County, 39 Or LUBA 256 (2000).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The mere presence of residential uses on EFU-zoned properties adjacent to a proposed exception area does not demonstrate that the subject property is irrevocably committed to nonfarm uses. In considering residential uses on adjacent properties, the county must identify in its findings the conflicts or other impacts between the residential uses and the subject property that make farm use of the subject property impracticable. Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 357 (2000).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A local government's findings that a proposed development is of a greater size, scale and intensity of development than was envisioned by the developer and nearby residents are inadequate to support denial of an application where those considerations are not based on any code standards or criteria. Ashley Manor Care Centers v. City of Grants Pass, 38 Or LUBA 308 (2000).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Although a decision maker is required to adopt findings that respond to relevant issues that are raised in quasi-judicial land use hearings, the decision maker is not necessarily required to adopt findings addressing particular items of evidence, provided LUBA is able to conclude that a reasonable decision maker could reach the disputed decision based on all the evidence. Schwerdt v. City of Corvallis, 38 Or LUBA 174 (2000).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings are inadequate, where they simply acknowledge statements that are made in a permit application and do not explain what the decision maker believes to be the relevant facts or explain why those facts lead to a conclusion that approval criteria are met. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where the local government's findings are based entirely on a faulty analysis of the evidence, LUBA will remand the decision to permit the local government to reweigh and review the evidence and adopt findings consistent with a correct analysis. Johnson v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 73 (1999).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A city's findings of compliance with conditional use criteria requiring that a "proposed use is consistent with the overall development character of the neighborhood with regard to building size, height, color, material and form" are conclusory and inadequate, where the city's findings do not describe either the boundaries or characteristics of the relevant neighborhood, but instead compare the proposed use to development in geographically distant parts of the city without explaining why those areas are part of the relevant neighborhood. Terra v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 582 (1999).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A hearings officer's findings which rely on the absence of business records and the testimony of a neighbor to conclude that a nonconforming use was discontinued are supported by substantial evidence, where the findings address the conflicting evidence submitted by the applicant and explain why that evidence did not establish the continued existence of the nonconforming use. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 36 Or LUBA 273 (1999).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The record in one proceeding does not include the record and hearing officer's decision of a previous conditional use application for a separate but similar use at a different location when the two determinations stem from independent requests, different parties and the decision maker did not rely on that previous decision in approving the current application. Buckman Community Assoc. v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 800 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The failure of findings to identify the evidence that supports the findings is not necessarily fatal, so long as the response brief or the briefs filed by other parties direct LUBA's attention to evidence in the record that supports those findings. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 35 Or LUBA 421 (1999).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A county's finding of compliance with a standard requiring that a nonforest dwelling not interfere with forest practices is inadequate, where the county merely finds that the proposed dwelling presents no greater risk of fire than posed by existing residential development, and fails to address evidence that the cumulative risk of fire from the proposed dwelling and existing development will require the owner of an adjacent forestry operation to change forestry practices and incur additional costs. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Adequate findings of compliance with a local standard requiring that proposed nonresource uses not significantly increase the cost of accepted farm and forest practices must identify the farm and forest practices in the area, even if the local standard does not implement and thus need not be consistent with the similar statutory standard. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. An applicant does not carry his burden to demonstrate compliance with transportation-related criteria, where the findings supporting denial identify a flaw in the applicant's evidence resulting from conducting a traffic study in the summer when school trips would not be reflected in the study. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Petitioner's disagreement with the reasons specified by a local government for rejecting the evidence he submitted in support of a land use application provides no basis for reversal or remand. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings that the applicant has testified that applicable criteria will be met are conclusory and inadequate because they fail to identify the review standards, set out the facts relied upon or explain how those facts led to the decision. Turrell v. Harney County, 34 Or LUBA 423 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. For a local government to properly evaluate the quality and quantity of aggregate resources on a parcel, test holes or borings must be "representative." To be representative, a reasonable person must conclude that the local government's findings as to the quantity and quality of the resource throughout the subject property are supported by substantial evidence. Sanders v. Yamhill County, 34 Or LUBA 69 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. County and ODOT traffic engineers' testimony and commentary is not less credible simply because it is based on the applicant's data rather than the traffic engineers' own study. ODOT v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 57 (1998).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. When a challenged decision fails to incorporate a staff report or council minutes as findings, LUBA's review of the challenged decision for adequate findings is limited to the decision itself. Hackler v. City of Hermiston, 33 Or LUBA 755 (1997).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The county's findings of compliance with applicable criteria are inadequate where they do not identify the relevant approval standards, set out the facts relied upon, or explain how the facts lead to the conclusion that applicable standards are satisfied. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. There is no legal requirement that a local government address in its findings conflicting evidence upon which it chooses not to rely. Where a petitioner presents conflicting evidence to the city during a local appeal, but does not raise new issues, the city may rely on findings prepared prior to the local appeal. Tandem Development Corp. v. City of Hillsboro, 33 Or LUBA 335 (1997).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that an unlawful partition occurred prior to the date the variance applicant took title to the property is not adequate to demonstrate that the hardship is not "self-created," where the county provides no interpretation of the term "self-created hardship" and the variance applicant knew the property had been unlawfully partitioned. Elder v. Douglas County, 33 Or LUBA 276 (1997).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A hearings officer's finding that other residentially zoned property "may not be developable" does not factually justify the conclusion that "there are no non-agricultural lands" with priority for development. Alliance for Responsible Land Use v. Deschutes County, 33 Or LUBA 12 (1997).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where petitioners challenge the county's reliance on a traffic impact study that is three years old, but petitioners do not point to evidence in the record that undermines the conclusions of that study, petitioners fail to establish that the county's decision is not based on substantial evidence. Richards-Kreitzberg v. Marion County, 32 Or LUBA 76 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The county's reliance on the existence of adjacent non-resource parcels in justifying a committed exception is impermissible under OAR 660-04-028(6)(c)(A) where the findings do not adequately establish how or when the adjacent parcels were created. Johnson v. Lane County, 31 Or LUBA 454 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings are inadequate when they rely on a consultant's summary conclusions which are not based on evidence in the record. Friends of Metolius v. Jefferson County, 31 Or LUBA 160 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. County findings are inadequate when they fail to interpret an applicable local regulation, and fail to identify facts upon which the county relied in reaching its conclusions. LUBA will not overlook such inadequacies in the findings when no party cites evidence in the record that compels the interpretation and conclusion made by the county. DLCD v. Clatsop County, 31 Or LUBA 90 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A finding that water for a proposed dwelling will come from a neighbor's property is not supported by substantial evidence when it has not been shown that the water can be legally provided through the appropriate grant of water rights. Furler v. Curry County, 31 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. OAR 660-33-030(6) requires that the "more detailed data" upon which the county may rely in determining soil capability for forest uses be related to the SCS soils classification system and, therefore, before the county can rely on more detailed data, the county must establish that the source of the data has the requisite knowledge of the classification system, including the qualifications and expertise to classify soils under the system. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. When the county relies on a 1979 conditional use permit to find that a proposed partition satisfies the county's approval criteria, the county must make affirmative findings that the conditional use permit is valid. Tognoli v. Crook County, 30 Or LUBA 272 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A 1B designation on the county's Goal 5 inventory means that inadequate information exists on the site to determine its nature and, therefore, a county cannot rely on a site being listed as a 1B site to conclude that aggregate uses are allowed outright. Tognoli v. Crook County, 30 Or LUBA 272 (1996).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The attachment as an exhibit to the city's decision of a plot plan showing 3.95 acres of "open space" does not impose an unstated condition of approval requiring dedication of the open space, when the text of the decision makes clear it does not rely on that aspect of the plot plan. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. So long as the local government relies on evidence in the record in making its findings, the evidence upon which it relies can be either oral or written. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. When a challenged decision justifies amendments to the city's comprehensive plan and zoning maps by relying on a particular development proposal, approval of the amendments must be conditioned on implementation of that proposal. DLCD v. City of St. Helens, 29 Or LUBA 485 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where the county identifies Big Game Habitat Range as a Goal 5 resource that conflicts with a proposed aggregate operation, it must identify the evidence upon which it relies to support its finding that the proposed quarry will have insignificant impacts on big game more than one-quarter mile away. Palmer v. Lane County, 29 Or LUBA 436 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The county's finding, made as part of its Goal 5 ESEE analysis, that an aggregate site located within a Big Game Habitat Range is not uniquely suited to wildlife must be supported by substantial evidence, not just a statement that the wildlife can "freely relocate" to other parts of the Big Game Habitat Range. Palmer v. Lane County, 29 Or LUBA 436 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. While a local government is required to identify in its findings the facts it relies upon in reaching its decision, it is not required to explain why it chose to balance conflicting evidence in a particular way, or to identify evidence it chose not to rely on. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A local government's conclusion that required netting will have limited visual impacts on adjacent properties is unacceptably conclusory when unsupported by findings concerning how much netting is required or how high the netting must be. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. When the evidence in the record is conflicting, and the local government's findings fail to explain the basis for its conclusion or state which evidence it finds persuasive, LUBA must remand the decision for additional findings. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings supporting a local government determination that an existing use is lawful are inadequate if they do not interpret or apply relevant provisions of the local code and do not state the facts relied on by the local government. Penland v. Josephine County, 29 Or LUBA 213 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings which do not identify the ways a destination resort preliminary development plan is different from the previously approved conceptual site plan, the magnitude of such differences or why the local government believes the differences are minor, are not adequate to establish compliance with a code standard requiring the preliminary development plan to conform to the conceptual site plan and alterations, if any, to be minor in nature. Skrepetos v. Jackson County, 29 Or LUBA 193 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Where the local code requires the proposal have only minimal impacts on adjacent properties, considering the operating characteristics of the proposed use, the decision must identify what the operating characteristics of the proposed use are. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Local government findings of compliance with an applicable approval standard must state the facts the local government relies on and explain why those facts lead to the conclusion that the standard is satisfied. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 28 Or LUBA 123 (1994).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. While a local government is required to identify in its findings the facts it relied upon in reaching its decision, it is not required to explain why it chose to balance conflicting evidence in a particular way, or to identify evidence it chose not to rely on. Melton v. City of Cottage Grove, 28 Or LUBA 1 (1994).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A local government decision granting design review plan approval must identify the design review plan approved. McKenzie v. Multnomah County, 27 Or LUBA 523 (1994).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings which identify a lack of evidence concerning road capacity and evidence concerning traffic congestion during weekend events at existing uses and a proposed agricultural/horticultural school complex are adequate to explain why a decision maker concluded the applicant failed to carry its burden concerning a code "minimal adverse impact" standard. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 27 Or LUBA 453 (1994).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A local government is under no obligation to specifically discuss in a challenged decision all of the evidence in the record or to explain its reasons for choosing to rely upon particular evidence over other evidence. City of Barlow v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. It is erroneous for a county to determine a farm and forest zoned area has a residential character based on the existence of former homesites in the area. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. The alleged failure of the minutes of a local government's proceedings to specifically identify documents the local government relied upon provides no basis for striking those documents from the record. The function of findings of fact is to identify the evidence relied upon, there is no legal requirement that the minutes perform that function. McPeek v. Coos County, 25 Or LUBA 805 (1993).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. A local government decision approving a permit will be remanded to the local government if the decision fails to (1) identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts believed and relied upon by the local decision maker, and (3) explain how those facts lead to a decision that the proposal complies with the approval standards. Lathrop v. Wallowa County, 25 Or LUBA 693 (1993).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Although a local government is not required to discuss in its findings the evidence it does not rely on to support its decision, doing so may improve its chances of success on appeal to LUBA. LUBA will not read such findings as improperly shifting the burden of proof, where the findings read as a whole show the local government was only trying to demonstrate that it considered all relevant evidence. McKay Creek Valley Assoc. v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 238 (1993).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Findings explaining how the existing limited rural industrial uses near a proposed aggregate processing facility have not affected the historical stability of an EFU-zoned area, and that the existing and proposed industrial uses may discourage intrusion of rural residential development, are adequate to demonstrate compliance with an EFU zone "stability" standard. McKay Creek Valley Assoc. v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 238 (1993).

1.4.3 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Facts Relied on. Statements which merely summarize the evidence in the record, and do not state what the decision maker believes to be true, are not adequate findings of fact. Heiller v. Josephine County, 23 Or LUBA 551 (1992).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding of compliance with local water quality protection standards based on a condition of approval that requires the applicant to obtain federal and state environmental permits for its proposed wetland fill/removal is inadequate where the local government does not cite any specific state or federal standards or explain how those standards will ensure that the local water quality protection standards are satisfied. Royal Blue Organics v. City of Springfield, 81 Or LUBA 723 (2020).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Arguments that the city council's findings are inadequate because they do not explain why the city council disagreed with the planning commission provide no basis for reversal or remand where the city council adopted findings explaining its reasons for concluding that the criteria are met and where the petitioner does not identify any requirement in the code or elsewhere for the city council to explain why it reached a different conclusion than the planning commission. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Bandon, 81 Or LUBA 285 (2020).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. While applying pesticides and herbicides in a manner that causes overspray or drift onto adjoining properties is not an accepted farm practice for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), where the labels for some pesticides and herbicides effectively require a setback from certain sensitive uses regardless of whether drift or overspray occurs, a county will likely have to make specific factual findings about the specific setbacks required by particular chemicals on particular farming operations on surrounding farmlands, based on application methods, and whether the operation of each setback would force a significant change in farm practices. Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 348 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where an applicant proposes a planned development, and where a local code provision requires the local government to "seek to determine that the development * * * will not create a drainage or pollution problem outside the planned area," the local government errs by not adopting findings determining whether the construction of a road extension that is proposed as part of and that would provide access to the planned development will create a drainage or pollution problem outside the planned area. Lundeen v. City of Waldport, 80 Or LUBA 450 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a post-acknowledgement plan amendment would increase the amount of impervious surfaces permitted on the subject property, resulting in increased runoff volume, and the city's stormwater manual states that stormwater treatment facilities are designed to capture and treat only 80 percent of runoff volume, a conclusory finding that "the City standards will adequately collect and treat stormwater runoff" is inadequate to demonstrate, for purposes of OAR 660-023-0250(3)(b), that the city standards will eliminate the possibility of conflicts with a nearby creek which is a Goal 5 resource. Nicita v. City of Oregon City, 79 Or LUBA 22 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. On remand, where LUBA instructed the county to resolve whether the project applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation" for purposes of applying for an accessory farm dwelling for a relative, LUBA established that certain findings and evidence are necessary to establish compliance with OAR 660-033-0130(9). The county's findings fall short of establishing that the applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation," because it is an undefined term, and it is the county's obligation to attempt to articulate the thresholds that separate a "commercial" from a non-commercial farming operation, and to determine those thresholds in the first instance. Although the county has some discretion to determine the thresholds, that determination will necessarily constitute a mixed question of fact and law, subject to LUBA's review for legal error and evidentiary sufficiency. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or LUBA 171 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The focus of OAR 660-033-0130(9) and county code that implements it regarding whether the "farm operator * * * continue[s] to play the predominant role in the management and farm use of the farm," is on the farm operator's involvement in farm operations on the subject property, not on off-farm businesses that may relate to the farm operation. The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses do not help establish any element of OAR 660-033-0130(9). The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses is relevant to establishing the elements of OAR 660-033-0130(9) only in so much as the time spent on those businesses and away from the farm operation might undermine the claim that the farm operator will continue to play the "predominant role" in the farm operation and requires assistance in running the farm operation. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or LUBA 171 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings are inadequate to explain how a proposed adjustment to the minimum lot size to allow a duplex on a corner lot will not "allow an increase in density in the [applicable] zone" under a local code provision where the findings merely conclude that the adjustment "does not result in an increase in density associated with the proposed use of the development site." Hunt v. City of the Dalles, 79 Or LUBA 265 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county determines that a property qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750 because at least three dwellings existed on surrounding lots or parcels on January 1, 1993, based on a statement of the applicant, a recollection of the prior owner of one of the surrounding dwellings, an email from a contractor who worked on one of the surrounding dwellings, and a statement by the tax assessor that its records showed a dwelling in place on January 1, 1993, but where LUBA concludes that the county erred in accepting the email, where LUBA cannot determine whether the county would have reached the same conclusion without the email, and where the county's findings failed to address evidence that the tax rolls indicate existence of the dwelling as of July 1993 rather than January 1993, LUBA will remand for the county to adopt adequate findings. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Absent a legal definition for how the center point of a property must be established for purposes of determining whether it qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750, a county errs by not explaining the basis for its conclusion that its chosen method is the most appropriate and by not addressing opponents' arguments challenging that method. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county determines that a property qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750 because at least three dwellings existed on surrounding lots or parcels on January 1, 1993, based on a statement of the applicant, a recollection of the prior owner of one of the surrounding dwellings, an email from a contractor who worked on one of the surrounding dwellings, and a statement by the tax assessor that its records showed a dwelling in place on January 1, 1993, but where LUBA concludes that the county erred in accepting the email, where LUBA cannot determine whether the county would have reached the same conclusion without the email, and where the county's findings failed to address evidence that the tax rolls indicate existence of the dwelling as of July 1993 rather than January 1993, LUBA will remand for the county to adopt adequate findings. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Absent a legal definition for how the center point of a property must be established for purposes of determining whether it qualifies for a forest template dwelling under ORS 215.750, a county errs by not explaining the basis for its conclusion that its chosen method is the most appropriate and by not addressing opponents' arguments challenging that method. Eng v. Wallowa County, 79 Or LUBA 421 (2019).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. When and if a board of county commissioners adopts a revised staff report as its findings, it must identify the applicable standards, the facts used to meet those standards and explain how those facts led to the conclusion that the applicable criteria has been met. Simply adopting the report or incorporating the applicant's burden of proof statement is not sufficient to serve as support for adequate findings. VanSickle v. Klamath County, 78 Or LUBA 56 (2018).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In applying a vacation rental dwelling (VRD) standard that prohibits a VRD that would alter the character of the surrounding area so as to substantially limit permitted uses in the zoning district, the size of the residence, in and of itself, is largely irrelevant where a house of any size is permitted outright in the zone so long as it is occupied by the owner or leased on a long-term basis. Remand is required where the findings denying the VRD focus almost exclusively on the size of the dwelling rather than the proposed VRD use. Gu v. City of Bandon, 77 Or LUBA 535 (2018).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will remand a legislative text amendment prohibiting new fossil fuel export terminals when nothing in the city's decision or the record explains how the amendment is consistent with the city's comprehensive plan policy requiring the city to "support multimodal freight transportation improvements to provide competitive regional access to global markets." Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a city adopts a legislative text amendment prohibiting expansion of existing fossil fuel terminals without considering consistency with a subarea plan policy objective to "foster a business and policy environment that promotes continued private and public sector investments in infrastructure, facilities, equipment and jobs," LUBA will remand the decision to the city to consider whether prohibiting expansion of fossil fuel terminals is consistent with the objective. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where state agencies took the position before the county that two different county EFU zones were equally valuable for big game habitat, and without explanation the county amended its comprehensive plan Goal 5 protection program to allow significantly increased residential densities in one of those zones, remand is required for an explanation of the county's rationale. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Crook County, 76 Or LUBA 396 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county's ESEE analysis relies on an inflated estimate of the number of acres of big game habitat added to its Goal 5 inventory and greater existing residential densities in an area to justify allowing significantly increased residential densities on big game habitat in that area, remand is required for a better explanation of the county's rationale for increasing those residential densities. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Crook County, 76 Or LUBA 396 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the hearings officer adopts a board of commissioners' interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy that was articulated in a different decision, and that interpretation is not challenged on appeal, LUBA will reject a challenge to the adequacy of the hearings officer's findings, arguing that the findings fail to resolve all potential inconsistencies or ambiguities in applying the commissioners' interpretation to the proposed rezoning at issue, where the findings adequately explain the hearings officer's understanding of the plan policy, as interpreted by the commissioners, and adequately explain how the policy is applied to the rezoning application before the hearings officer. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 75 Or LUBA 302 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a petitioner challenges the adequacy of a county's findings that a small wind turbine is of the same general character as "communication towers, utility substations and transmission lines," arguing that the findings do not address the wind turbines' moving propellers, which the other uses do not have, but the findings in fact do address the moving propellers and provide a reason why the county did not believe that difference makes the wind turbines of a different "general character," LUBA will reject petitioner's findings challenge. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 75 Or LUBA 350 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city council's findings that identify the adverse impacts of a significant increase in the use of residences as vacation rental dwellings adequately identifies a "public need" in order to justify amendments to the city's zoning ordinances which prohibit and severely restrict vacation rental dwelling use. Whittemore v. City of Gearhart, 75 Or LUBA 374 (2017).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government could reasonably conclude that speculative concerns regarding the possibility of transmitting avian flu to nearby chicken farms via dead birds buried at a proposed landfill are adequately addressed by statutory and regulatory requirements intended to protect against that possibility. Stop the Dump Coalition v. Yamhill County, 74 Or LUBA 1 (2016).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will remand a decision concluding that a unit of land is a legal lot of record based on a county building permit for a dwelling on an adjoining unit of land, where the findings fail to explain or establish how a building permit approval can create a discrete unit of land, much less a legal lot of record. Grimstad v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 360 (2016).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government in denying an application for permit approval is not obligated to give the applicant a detailed roadmap that guarantees permit approval. However, under Commonwealth Properties v. Washington County, 35 Or App 387, 400, 582 P2d 1384 (1978), a local government must give the permit applicant some minimal idea of changes that might lead to permit approval. J. Conser and Sons, LLC v. City of Millersburg, 73 Or LUBA 57 (2016).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where findings identify an applicable conditional use standard that requires that conditional uses must not impair permitted uses on surrounding property, but the decision includes no findings of fact or findings explaining why the decision maker believed proposed wind turbines satisfied that standard, remand is required for adequate findings. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. It will rarely be the case that an approval standard and the facts are such that it will suffice to quote the standard and conclude that the standard is met, without any further explanation. Where a use that is not listed as a permitted or conditional use in a zone may be approved if it is of the same character or has similar impacts as uses that are listed as permitted or conditional uses in the zone, and a proposed wind turbine has external moving parts that the listed uses do not, findings that simply quote the "same character or similar impacts" standard and conclude without any explanation that the standard is met, are inadequate. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the city previously approved a conceptual development plan showing an arterial road in a particular location, the city's findings denying a subsequent application for detailed development plan approval are inadequate, where the findings do not give the applicant a better idea of how the city council would go about approving a road in the location shown in the conceptual development plan. GPA 1, LLC v. City of Corvallis, 73 Or LUBA 339 (2016).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local code provision provides that minimum lot width may be reduced if "[o]n balance, the proposed lots will have dimensions that are consistent with the purpose of this section," it is remandable error where the local code provides for nine purposes to be considered, but the decision maker considers only some of the nine purposes, and concludes without explanation, that "on balance, the applicant has not demonstrated that the proposal is consistent with the purpose of the lot dimension regulations." In this context, such findings are inadequate because an "on balance" determination requires the city to adopt findings explaining how it balances the different purposes. Sage Equities, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 163 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local code provision requires a determination that "[o]n balance, the proposed lots will have dimensions that are consistent with the purpose of this section," and the section provides for nine purposes to be considered, a city may be able to assign greater or lesser significance to a particular purpose based on direction from the city's code, comprehensive plan or other land use document. But a city errs to the extent that it interprets the "on balance" determination to allow denial based solely on a finding of inconsistency with one or two of the nine purposes, without considering consistency with all of the purposes. Sage Equities, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 163 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local code provision regulating minimum lot size requires a determination of whether a proposal is consistent with purposes of the code section, and an applicable code section is intended to ensure that "[e]ach lot has enough room for a reasonably-sized attached or detached house[,]" a finding that the applicants have not demonstrated that "each parcel has enough room for a reasonably sized detached house[,]" is conclusory, because it fails to explain what constitutes a "reasonably-sized" house. Sage Equities, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 163 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will remand for more adequate findings where a city finds that a stormwater conveyance system constructed to city standards will minimize potential adverse impacts of stormwater pollutants on estuarine fish resources, where the finding does not describe potential adverse impacts, address expert testimony regarding those impacts, or explain why compliance with city stormwater construction standards is sufficient to minimize potential adverse impacts. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding of consistency with a comprehensive plan policy requiring that residential densities maintain a proper relationship between public facilities and services and population distribution is inadequate, where the finding merely recites that proposed higher density residential development will comply with the density requirements in the code, but without explaining how density will maintain the proper relationship between public facilities and population distribution. Kine v. City of Bend, 72 Or LUBA 423 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding of consistency with a comprehensive plan provision requiring that future development shall respect the character of the existing area is inadequate, where the finding simply states that the general character of the area is "residential," without evaluating whether placing higher density residential development in the middle of an area zoned and developed with low density residential development is consistent with respecting the character of the existing area. Kine v. City of Bend, 72 Or LUBA 423 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a zone change standard requires a finding that adequate transportation networks to support the use are presently provided or planned to be provided concurrently with development of the property, a finding that this standard is met because future development will be subject to subdivision and site design review is inadequate to establish that the subject site has required secondary access or that such access is planned to be provided concurrently with development of the property. Kine v. City of Bend, 72 Or LUBA 423 (2015).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Plan goals requiring that development be "compatible" and seek to "protect" nearby neighborhoods are somewhat subjective. Where a local government recognizes that greater proposed building height and mass could result in incompatibility and (1) reduces the proposed building height, (2) requires that increased building heights be stepped down next to adjoining residential neighborhoods, (3) requires enhanced design review, and (4) imposes additional minimum setbacks, LUBA will not second guess the city regarding the adequacy of those measure to protect nearby neighborhoods so as to achieve compatibility. Lowery v. City of Portland, 68 Or LUBA 339 (2013).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will reject petitioner's challenge to a plan map amendment for a proposal that would result in taller building heights, based on a plan compatibility policy, where the proposal is subject to conflicting plan policies, only one of which supports petitioner's position opposing the increased building height on compatibility grounds, and petitioner fails to challenge the local governments findings balancing those polities to find that the increase building heights equally or betters supports the policies viewed as a whole. Lowery v. City of Portland, 68 Or LUBA 339 (2013).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings are inadequate to explain why a tentative planned unit development (PUD) and subdivision will not be a significant risk to public health and safety, where evidence in the record demonstrates that the portions of the property that will be developed with roads, parking lots, and sewer, water and electrical lines contain loose soils. In that circumstance, where the findings do not conclude that the public health and safety standard does not apply to roads, parking lots, and sewer, electrical and water lines, and there is no finding that these aspects of the proposed PUD and subdivision can be constructed on those loose soils without causing unreasonable or significant public health and safety concerns, the findings are inadequate. Willamette Oaks, LLC v. City of Eugene, 67 Or LUBA 33 (2013).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The findings denying an application for a quasi-judicial zoning and comprehensive plan map amendment are adequate, where they explain that the two commissioners who participated in the decision could not agree whether the application satisfied two approval criteria and that by operation of law that failure to achieve a majority vote in favor of the application results in denial. The county was not required to adopt findings that are adequate to deny the application on the merits, where the decision does not deny the application on the merits. Warren v. Josephine County, 67 Or LUBA 74 (2013).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the city takes the position during the initial proceedings below that an adopted plan is an applicable approval criterion, but reverses that position during the multi-hearing proceedings before the city council and takes the position that the adopted plan is not an applicable approval criterion because it is not yet effective, a city does not commit error in failing to adopt findings that confirm that the plan is not a source of approval criteria. Vest v. City of Molalla, 66 Or LUBA 155 (2012).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A hearings officer's finding that a code requirement that a proposed kennel be compatible with surrounding uses is met where the kennel is required to satisfy applicable DEQ noise standards is inadequate, where the findings do not explain why the hearings officer concluded that compliance with the applicable DEQ noise standards necessarily means that the proposed use is compatible with surrounding residential uses. Butcher v. Washington County, 65 Or LUBA 263 (2012).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the local government denies an application based on its conclusion that an applicant did not provide sufficient information, and the applicant submitted detailed information and studies regarding impacts to water quality, water flow, land stability and erosion, the findings are inadequate where they do not explain why the information that was submitted was not "sufficient." Tidewater Contractors v. Curry County, 65 Or LUBA 424 (2012).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings addressing a code variance standard that provides that application of the standard to be varied "would result in practical difficulty * * * inconsistent with the objectives of this Code" are inadequate, where the findings address whether the variance would be consistent with identified code objectives, not whether application of the standard to be varied would cause practical difficulties inconsistent with code objectives. JCK Enterprises LLC v. City of Cottage Grove, 64 Or LUBA 142 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will affirm a finding that the combination of a corner lot and shared access requirements between two adjoining lots proposed for two commercial drive-through establishments are sufficient to constitute a "hardship" that is not "self-imposed," for purposes of granting a variance to allow one commercial use to place its drive-through within a street setback, where the applicant is not responsible for the lot configuration and access restrictions. The fact that the applicant could construct a different combined commercial use on the two lots without a variance to the setback does not necessarily mean that no hardship exists or that the hardship is self-imposed. JCK Enterprises LLC v. City of Cottage Grove, 64 Or LUBA 142 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a hearings official's decision to approve a group care home with an on-site sewerage disposal system that is only approved for use with residential strength effluent demonstrates that the hearings official was unaware of and did not consider evidence that a similar group care home generated stronger than residential strength effluent, remand is required to consider that evidence. Freedman v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 309 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a petitioner assigns error on the basis that a hearings official failed to explain how he applied an Oregon Department of Environmental Quality Table in approving a septic system, but the hearings official in fact adopted such findings and those findings are neither acknowledged nor challenged by petitioner, the assignment of error will be denied. Freedman v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 309 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the record includes an Oregon Department of Human Services, Oregon Health Division report that concludes that the aquifer serving the well would be "highly susceptible to contamination" from a septic drainage field that is sited within 500 feet of the existing well, and the hearings official's decision approving the septic drainage field neither acknowledges nor addresses that report, remand is required for an explanation for why that potential for contamination does not implicate a local "carrying capacity" standard. Freedman v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 309 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that the "location, size, design and operating characteristics" of a mixed-use development in a commercial zone will be compatible with surrounding properties are inadequate, where the findings do not describe any of the "operating characteristics" of the mixed-use development or evaluate whether those operating characteristics will be compatible with surrounding properties. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 64 Or LUBA 377 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings are inadequate to explain how a proposed waste water treatment facility on EFU land would either "force a significant change in" the adjacent farming practices or "significantly increase the cost of" an adjacent organic farming operation under ORS 215.296(1) where the findings do not explain what the "significant impacts" to the organic farming operation would be or explain how the potential for spray drift from the proposed facility would either "force a significant change in" the organic farm practices or "significantly increase the cost of" the operation. Falcon Heights WSD v. Klamath County, 64 Or LUBA 390 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the evidence the county appears to rely on appears to show that state noise standards are violated by a wind energy facility at four residences, but the county only finds that the noise standards are violated at one residence, the decision must be remanded for additional findings. Mingo v. Morrow County, 63 Or LUBA 357 (2011).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A permit decision consisting of a checklist with marginal notations that approval criteria are "Satisfied" or "Conditionally Satisfied" falls short of providing the findings and explanation why the evidence shows that the criteria are satisfied that is required by ORS 215.416(9). Olstedt v. Clatsop County, 62 Or LUBA 131 (2010).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government's findings that an application for subdivision approval should be denied for failure to include a traffic study are inadequate, where there is no evidence that any of the circumstances that might require a traffic study under the local code were present and there was no suggestion during the local proceedings that planning staff believed a traffic study was necessary. Montgomery v. City of Dunes City, 60 Or LUBA 274 (2010).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Although a local government's findings may be brief, findings must be more than a bare conclusion that applicable approval criteria are satisfied. In addressing an approval criterion that the proposed use will have "minimal adverse impact upon adjoining properties," the findings must identify the alleged impacts and explain why they will be minimal. Scott v. City of Jacksonville, 60 Or LUBA 307 (2010).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will remand for more adequate findings regarding a code requirement for "guaranteed access," where the local government relies upon a roadway easement on adjoining land that is not in the record and that arguably does not serve the subject property. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 60 Or LUBA 336 (2010).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings to explain the basis for denial of a permit are inadequate where the findings do not explain which criteria the application fails to meet or otherwise inform the applicant what steps are necessary to obtain approval under the relevant criteria. Bridge Street Partners v. City of Lafayette, 56 Or LUBA 387 (2008).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In addressing a requirement that a proposed use on forestland not interfere with nearby farming practices, a county must address the impacts on an adjacent parcel when the petitioner alleges that there will be adverse impacts on the adjacent parcel. Tennant v. Polk County, 56 Or LUBA 455 (2008).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a comprehensive plan categorizes lands within the urban growth boundary according to suitability for development, a county errs by denying a request for rezoning on the basis that the requested rezoning is inconsistent with the comprehensive plan, where the findings identify nothing in the comprehensive plan that supports a conclusion that the property's low suitability rating precludes the requested rezoning. Sperber v. Coos County, 56 Or LUBA 763 (2008).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a rezoning standard requires a finding that the rezoning "will not seriously interfere with permitted uses on other nearby parcels," a county's findings that the standard is not met due to "access and fire safety concerns" are inadequate, where those findings address concerns with development on the rezoned property and have no obvious bearing on interference with development on nearby parcels. Sperber v. Coos County, 56 Or LUBA 763 (2008).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the dispute during local proceedings on remand regarding a visual impact approval criterion centered on whether photographic evidence submitted by broadcast tower opponents simulated six-foot diameter microwave antennas or much larger antennas, the hearings officer's unexplained decision to allow microwave antennas to be sited on the towers without additional review so long as they did not exceed eight feet in diameter requires remand so that the hearings officer can explain her selection of the eight-foot parameter. Save Our Skyline v. City of Bend, 55 Or LUBA 12 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A hearings officer's decision to incorporate a "safe harbor" in her approval of broadcast towers that would allow additional microwave antennas to be sited on the towers in the future without additional review against visual impact approval criteria so long as they were not sited higher than 150 feet is erroneous, where the decision included no explanation for why the 150-foot parameter was selected. Save Our Skyline v. City of Bend, 55 Or LUBA 12 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A hearings officer's findings that a proposed cellular tower complies with a siting standard that requires the tower to minimize its effect on scenic values are adequate, where the findings note the developed nature of the butte where the cellular tower would be located and demonstrate that the hearings officer was persuaded that the standard was met by the applicant's proposal to shorten the tower from 100 feet to 70 feet and to offer alternative designs that would make the tower look more like its surroundings. Skyliner Summit at Broken Top v. City of Bend, 54 Or LUBA 316 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's findings in support of its decision to deny permit approval must adequately interpret and apply the criteria the city relies on to deny the application in a way that is consistent with the language of the criteria and must provide a coherent explanation for why the city believes the proposal does not comply with the criteria. A city decision will be remanded where its findings do not comply with these minimum requirements for adequate findings. Caster v. City of Silverton, 54 Or LUBA 441 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government's conclusory finding that a sign plan complies with applicable criteria is not a basis for remand where the signage standards are clear and objective, and petitioners do not identify anything about the sign plan or the applicable standards that require more detailed discussion or findings. Western Express v. Umatilla County, 54 Or LUBA 571 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that simply states that an approval standard is satisfied "as shown in" the application and oral testimony, without any attempt to state the facts relied upon or explain why the facts demonstrate compliance with the standard, is inadequate. O'Rourke v. Union County, 54 Or LUBA 614 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A conclusion that no potential off-street parking site is available within 500 feet of the subject property is not supported by adequate findings or evidence where the decision simply rejects alternative sites for unexplained "topographic" reasons. Grant v. City of Depoe Bay, 53 Or LUBA 214 (2007).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Under a variance standard requiring that the "hardship" not be "self-created," a finding that the "applicant's desire to partition his property" created the "hardship" is an insufficient basis to deny the variance request, where the hardship is the lack of alternative access to the proposed parcel and there is no explanation in the findings how petitioner's desire to partition his property created the lack of alternative access to the proposed parcel. Krishchenko v. City of Canby, 52 Or LUBA 290 (2006).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A hearings officer's findings are sufficient to explain why a proposed subdivision complies with criteria that require preserving existing natural drainage channels where those findings explain that drainage within the historic drainage area has largely been diverted and there is no evidence that more than a de minimis flow of drainage will cross a shallow swale on the property to be subdivided. Kyle v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 399 (2006).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that an intervening road will buffer commercial and residential uses, and that rely on site design review standards to minimize adverse impacts of future commercial uses, are sufficient to explain why a zone change from office to commercial uses is consistent with a refinement plan policy that encourages location of office uses as a transition between commercial and residential uses. Bothman v. City of Eugene, Or LUBA 701 (2006).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a variance criterion requires the city to find that "public need" outweighs "adverse impacts" of developing wetlands and a party argues there is no market demand for the commercial development that the variance would allow, the city must address in its findings the role, if any, that market demand plays under the variance criterion and explain why the public need, as the city interprets those words, outweighs the identified potential adverse impacts. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 51 Or LUBA 363 (2006).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where intervenors provide in their response brief an alternative theory for affirming the challenged decision in the event necessary findings are found not to be supported by substantial evidence, and that alternative theory does not appear in the challenged findings, LUBA will decline to affirm on that basis, and will remand to allow the local government to consider that alternative theory in the first instance. Anderson v. Coos County, 51 Or LUBA 454 (2006).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. While a code standard that allows a reduced setback for cellular towers based on listed considerations that increase or reduce off-site impacts does not require that the hearings officer assign equal weight to each of the listed considerations, it also does not allow the hearings officer to assign conclusive weight to one consideration while ignoring others. Where some considerations point toward increasing the setback, and others point to reduction, the hearings officer must adopt findings addressing all relevant considerations and explaining what weight is given to each and why weighing of all the circumstances supports the ultimate conclusion. Tollefson v. Jackson County, 51 Or LUBA 790 (2006).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A challenge to the adequacy of findings will be sustained where the decision maker fails to explain why a code provision that prohibits development unless a developer makes transportation improvements necessary to maintain a particular level of service applies only at the time of a zone change and not to a site plan and architectural review application. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Medford, 49 Or LUBA 52 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A conclusory finding that a traffic study is sufficient to determine access requirements is inadequate where the finding fails to set out the applicable criteria or explain what those access requirements are. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Medford, 49 Or LUBA 52 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the decision approves a cul-de-sac that may be longer than 600 feet, depending on how the "block" is measured, remand is necessary to explain how the blocks created by the cul-de-sac comply with a subdivision approval standard prohibiting blocks longer than 600 feet as measured between the centerline of "through cross streets." Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the relevant legal standards mandate a regimented step-by-step analysis, and the findings adopted in support of a decision to deny a permit under those legal standards are brief and do not come close to providing the level of detail that is required to address the legal standards, remand is required. Hellberg v. Morrow County, 49 Or LUBA 423 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that an annexation area is adjacent to a long-developed urban neighborhood with full public services that can be readily extended to the annexed territory area are sufficient to demonstrate compliance with a code criterion requiring that "an adequate level of urban services and infrastructure is available or will be made available in a timely manner." Cutsforth v. City of Albany, 49 Or LUBA 559 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings are inadequate where they simply disagree with a hearings officer's interpretation of what an approval standard requires, without explaining what the decision maker believes the standard to require or why the evidence satisfies the standard. Knutson Family LLC v. City of Eugene, 48 Or LUBA 399 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Evidence that a planning commissioner or member of the board of commissioners may have misunderstood the applicable standard does not provide a basis for reversal or remand where the challenged decision correctly identifies the applicable standards and correctly applies the law. Potts v. Clackamas County, 48 Or LUBA 521 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. An approval standard that requires that the local government identify the alternative that "most effectively carries out comprehensive plan goals and policies" necessarily requires balancing when the plan includes many overlapping policies that can work at cross-purposes. Findings that explain how the city chose to balance those plan goals and policies and which goals and policies the city emphasized are adequate, even if petitioners would have emphasized other goals and policies. Doob v. City of Grants Pass, 48 Or LUBA 587 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a development code includes a requirement that its standards for subdivision approval must "provide safe * * * traffic conditions," findings that explain how an amended development code subdivision approval standard will make the transportation system safer are adequate to demonstrate compliance with that development code requirement notwithstanding that alternative subdivision approval standards might result in safer traffic conditions or achieve those safer traffic conditions more quickly. Doob v. City of Grants Pass, 48 Or LUBA 587 (2005).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that briefly describe existing parks within the city are inadequate to demonstrate that a proposed new park complies with a standard requiring that other properly zoned land is not available in sufficient quantity to meet current and projected needs. Nielson v. City of Stayton, 47 Or LUBA 52 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A decision to deny a dwelling based on an applicant's failure to demonstrate that the dwelling has only "minimum impact" on wildlife habitat is inadequate, where the hearings officer also found that the dwelling complies with big game habitat criteria and that such compliance establishes a presumption that the dwelling has only minimum impact on habitat, and the hearings officer does not explain those apparently inconsistent findings. McAlister v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 125 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that proposed residential development is consistent with permitted uses in the zone are inadequate to demonstrate that the proposed development is compatible with the "existing land use pattern in the area." Doob v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 147 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a decision's findings rely on the supply of light industrial lands outside the UGB, but fail to consider the supply of light industrial and commercial lands within the UGB zoned to allow a proposed storage facility on rural land that serves residents within the UGB, those findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with rezoning criteria requiring a "need" to rezone land. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 47 Or LUBA 160 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Conclusory findings that proposed development is consistent with the current development pattern in the area are inadequate to demonstrate that the proposed development is "consistent with the character of the surrounding area," particularly when the local code calls for a "detailed review." Seaton v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 178 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where LUBA is able to determine that a reasonable decision maker could rely on the evidence the decision maker chose to rely on, findings specifically addressing conflicting evidence are unnecessary. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. That lot-of-record dwellings are allowed in the EFU zone is an insufficient basis to demonstrate compliance with a code standard requiring that a proposed lot-of-record dwelling will not materially alter the stability of the land use pattern in the area. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. That lot-of-record dwellings are allowed in the EFU zone is an insufficient basis to demonstrate compliance with a code standard requiring a finding that the proposed dwelling will not create conditions or circumstances "contrary to the purposes or intent" of the county comprehensive plan and code. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Whether property with predominantly nonfarm soils should nevertheless be viewed as "other lands suitable for farm use" under a county code standard that replicates the Goal 3 definition of agricultural land, is governed by specific considerations. That a property may have been briefly used as an elk and deer holding facility is not one of the specified considerations. Rutigliano v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 470 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that recite lengthy efforts by the city historic preservation board to encourage an applicant to preserve an historic building are adequate to show that the city met its obligations under a plan policy requiring the city to "encourage" preservation of historic structures. Chin v. City of Corvallis, 46 Or LUBA 1 (2003).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that a proposed dead-end street can exceed the code maximum grade because there are no turning movements on the street is inadequate, where the finding fails to take into account turning movements at the intersection of the local street and the nearest public road, where the grade also exceeds the maximum. McCulloh v. City of Jacksonville, 46 Or LUBA 267 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that address a city requirement that a proposed annexation must be a "natural extension" of city limits are adequate, where the findings explain that the area to be annexed will provide contiguity between existing city boundaries and commercially zoned property located outside city limits that will require annexation and the extension of urban services when they are developed. West Side Rural F.P.D v. City of Hood River, 46 Or LUBA 451 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. When a local decision maker denies a person standing to participate in the local proceeding, the local decision maker must explain why that person was denied standing. Swanson v. Jackson County, 46 Or LUBA 629 (2004).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The proponent of "more stringent requirements" under ORS 836.623(1) has some burden to identify what additional requirements may be necessary to ensure public safety. Where the proponent merely argues that proposed development near an airport runway should be denied because existing standards cannot ensure ground safety against airplane crashes, local government findings rejecting the need for more stringent requirements may be equally conclusory. Graham Oil Co. v. City of North Bend, 44 Or LUBA 18 (2003).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. City findings that conclude that proposed park facility development within a floodway complies with a comprehensive plan policy regarding community parks are inadequate where those findings interpret the community park policy as being both aspirational and mandatory and the city's findings provide no explanation for that apparent discrepancy. Monogios v. City of Pendleton, 44 Or LUBA 576 (2003).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's findings that a proposed tram system that will pass through open space zoned land is consistent with the purpose of the open space zone because the tram system will provide linkages between the hiking trails located at one end of the tramway and recreational amenities such as walkways, bikeways and parks located at the other end of the tramway adequately explains why the proposed tram system is consistent with that purpose statement. No Tram to OHSU v. City of Portland, 44 Or LUBA 647 (2003).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that a proposed destination resort is located in a setting with "high natural amenities" as required by ORS 197.445 is inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence, where neither the county's decision nor the record identifies or describes any high natural amenities near the proposed resort. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 44 Or LUBA 745 (2003).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that a 1973 deed satisfied then existing subdivision regulations so as to legalize a parcel that was described in the 1973 deed is inadequate, where the finding does not address the terms of the subdivision ordinance nor explain why property described in a deed constitutes a "replat" or "resubdivision," as those terms are used in the subdivision ordinance. Palaske v. Clackamas County, 43 Or LUBA 202 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local zoning ordinance adopts a definition of "lot of record" for purposes of identifying certain nonconforming lots and parcels that may be developed notwithstanding their inconsistency with the zoning ordinance requirements, a finding that concludes that a tract of land is a parcel and therefore is developable, but does not address the lot of record definition, is inadequate. Palaske v. Clackamas County, 43 Or LUBA 202 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's finding that a county zoning boundary line is coterminous with the city's coastal shorelands boundary is inadequate where the decision does not explain why the zoning boundary is related to the shorelands boundary or, assuming that is the case, why a subsequent city amendment relocating the coastal shorelands boundary effected a corresponding relocation of the zoning boundary. DLCD v. City of Gold Beach, 43 Or LUBA 319 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's finding that its coastal shorelands boundary is the landward "line of active and conditionally stable foredunes" is inadequate where the city's comprehensive plan identifies the coastal shorelands boundary as the area on the property that is subject to ocean flooding and includes a map depicting the area subject to ocean flooding, and the city's decision does not explain why the "line of active and conditionally stable foredunes" is the same as the area subject to ocean flooding. DLCD v. City of Gold Beach, 43 Or LUBA 319 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will remand a city decision denying a partition application where it is not clear what documents make up the local decision and the documents that are identified as containing the final land use decision do not set out the city's rationale for denying the application. Martin v. City of Dunes City, 43 Or LUBA 354 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. LUBA will remand a county decision that alternatives to siting a radio transmission tower on EFU-zoned land are infeasible where the county did not adopt findings explaining why six of the identified sites are infeasible and the parties do not cite to evidence in the record that "clearly supports" the county's decision that the six sites are infeasible. Van Nalts v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 497 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county considers dust impacts from mining that may have an impact on neighboring residential uses, those dust impacts may form a basis for denial only if the impacts violate applicable Department of Environmental Quality air quality standards. Morse Bros., Inc. v. Linn County, 42 Or LUBA 484 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city decision concluding that applying local sign ordinance criteria to deny a sign permit would violate Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution is inadequate, where the findings do not identify what aspects of the local sign ordinance the city believes would be found to be unconstitutional or explain why the city believes it would be unconstitutional to apply the sign ordinance. Haug v. City of Newberg, 42 Or LUBA 411 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where an application for city approval of a sign that is larger than allowed by city sign standards does not meet the city's criteria for approval of such larger signs, a city may not cite constitutional concerns and approve the request for a larger sign without (1) adopting a reviewable decision that explains what constitutional provisions the city believes would be violated and why, and (2) explaining why the appropriate remedy in that circumstance would not be to deny the request until constitutional provisions for allowing such larger signs are adopted. Haug v. City of Newberg, 42 Or LUBA 411 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where it is not apparent that a local road improvement standard is satisfied by improving one road access or whether all accesses to a property must be improved to city standards prior to approval of a conditional use permit, city findings that establish that one access to the property is improved to city standards are inadequate to demonstrate that the local road improvement standard is met. Monogios and Co. v. City of Pendleton, 42 Or LUBA 291 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. It is inconsistent with a county's findings obligation under ORS 215.416(9) for the county to simply declare, without explanation, that it prefers the staff count of existing dwellings in the area and is not persuaded by petitioners' evidence of fewer dwellings, where petitioners provided specific, direct evidence supporting their dwelling count, and the staff figure is conclusory and based on evidence not in the record. Matiaco v. Columbia County, 42 Or LUBA 277 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. When an applicant asserts below that it is entitled to a well under the statutory exemption to obtaining a water use permit pursuant to ORS 537.545 and the findings supporting denial on the basis of lack of a water source do not address or respond to that assertion, the findings are inadequate. Molalla River Reserve, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 251 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. When the applicant and the local government address approval criteria using different approaches, findings denying the application must provide an explanation for why the applicant's approach is inadequate and explain, in at least a general way, how the applicant must address the criteria under the local government's approach. Molalla River Reserve, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 251 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that a proposed underground shooting range cannot be detected by sight, smell or sound from adjacent residential property are adequate to explain why the proposed shooting range is compatible with adjacent property. Chilla v. City of North Bend, 41 Or LUBA 539 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that existing improvements and the presence of seasonal drainage areas limit farm use of agricultural land is inadequate to demonstrate that the land is irrevocably committed to nonfarm uses, where the finding fails to describe the limitations, or explain why such longstanding limitations now render farm use of the subject property impracticable, given the history of farm use on the property. Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 41 Or LUBA 358 (2002).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the county's code requires that streets providing access to a proposed land division be improved to a specified width and composition if the streets (1) will serve four or more lots or parcels and (2) are likely to serve additional lots or parcels in the future, LUBA will remand a decision when the county appears to answer those questions in the affirmative by requiring compliance with the width standard, but does not require compliance with the composition standard, and does not explain the reason for the apparent inconsistency. Dudek v. Umatilla County, 40 Or LUBA 416 (2001).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that a proposed church expansion doubling the capacity of the church will not have greater adverse traffic impacts is inadequate, where the finding relies solely on the church's current plan to consolidate multiple daily services into a single service, and fails to explain why concentrating traffic from multiple services will not result in greater impacts or to address the possibility that future growth in church membership associated with the expansion may require additional services. Weaver v. Linn County, 40 Or LUBA 203 (2001).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a variance criterion requires that a variance conform to the comprehensive plan, a city's finding that a variance will promote in-fill and higher residential density is insufficient to demonstrate that the variance, allowing a lot to be divided into two lots, satisfies that criterion where the findings identify no comprehensive plan provisions encouraging in-fill and higher residential density. Reagan v. City of Oregon City, 39 Or LUBA 672 (2001).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county adopts unchallenged findings that siting a cellular phone tower next to a power line right-of-way does not create a hazardous condition, because the tower is designed to collapse in on itself in high winds rather than fall to the side, and those findings are supported by testimony from an engineer with the company that will construct the tower, the county's findings are adequate and supported by substantial evidence. Pereira v. Columbia County, 39 Or LUBA 575 (2001).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A decision that an existing road need not be considered as an alternative under OAR 660-012-0065(5)(a) is not supported by substantial evidence where there is no attempt to identify how costly it would be to address safety problems and bring the road up to applicable standards so that it could be approved by a registered engineer. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 39 Or LUBA 478 (2001).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a proposed aggregate extraction site must demonstrate compliance with a public need criterion and a criterion that requires consideration of alternative sites, but identified alternative sites are rejected without explanation and the only cited evidence regarding public need is testimony from the public works director that he would support a site anywhere in the county, the decision is not supported by adequate findings or substantial evidence. Donnell v. Union County, 39 Or LUBA 419 (2001).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's finding that a proposed memorial is compatible with the applicable park master plan is inadequate, where the city's findings do not explain why the proposal to use a nearby street for vehicular access and parking for the memorial is compatible with the plan's recommendation to close that street to vehicles. Carlsen v. City of Portland, 39 Or LUBA 93 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Remand is necessary for a city to address a criterion requiring the existence of a "specific geographic justification" to site a memorial within a public park, where the city's findings do not identify a geographic justification or explain why no such justification is needed. Carlsen v. City of Portland, 39 Or LUBA 93 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a city's findings explain both a short term and long term solution for storm water that will be generated by a proposal and how they will be paid for and explain how storm water will be detained onsite, those findings are adequate to demonstrate compliance with a site design review criterion that requires that the proposed drainage facilities minimize the impact on public agencies' drainage facilities. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that one alternative for providing sewer service to a proposed medical hardship dwelling has been approved by county health officials is inadequate to demonstrate compliance with an approval standard that requires that another alternative be used unless that alternative "is not feasible." Puma v. Linn County, 38 Or LUBA 762 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a neighboring farmer identifies significant changes and significant cost increases to his ranching operation from a proposed motocross race track and off-road vehicle park, the county must find that the proposed park, as conditioned, will not cause those impacts. Such findings are inadequate where the county does not address those identified impacts or explain why the proposed park, as conditioned, will not cause those impacts. Utsey v. Coos County, 38 Or LUBA 516 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that characteristics of adjoining uses support an irrevocably committed exception to Goal 3 are inadequate where the findings do not explain (1) how many of the adjoining lots are developed, (2) what activities on those lots have impacts on the proposed exception area, (3) why services provided to those lots impact the proposed exception area, or (4) why adjoining recreational and open space uses make farm use of the proposed exception area impracticable. Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 489 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In denying an application for land use approval based on a finding that the application does not comply with applicable criteria, a local government must explain in its findings why it believes the applicable criteria are not satisfied. Further, the local government's findings must be sufficient to inform petitioner either what steps are necessary to obtain approval or that it is unlikely that the application will be approved. Rogue Valley Manor v. City of Medford, 38 Or LUBA 266 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings are inadequate, where they simply acknowledge statements that are made in a permit application and do not explain what the decision maker believes to be the relevant facts or explain why those facts lead to a conclusion that approval criteria are met. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city adopts inadequate findings of compliance with a standard requiring park facilities or fees in lieu thereof adequate to serve proposed development, where the findings fail to address whether an identified park site is adequate to serve the development, and fail to explain why system development charges (SDCs) collected at the time building permits are issued will suffice to pay for parks adequate to serve the development. Breen v. City of Salem, 37 Or LUBA 961 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Remand is appropriate where the county's decision rezones 10 acres of a 121-acre farm/forest parcel to allow the landowner to site a nonresource dwelling, without explaining why the rezone is consistent with a code provision prohibiting rezoning that affords "special privileges to an individual property owner not available to the general public." McLane v. Klamath County, 37 Or LUBA 888 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that rely on factors such as soil acidity, poor drainage, traffic conflicts, and the availability of irrigation that are conditions common to the area are inadequate to explain why farming cannot practicably be managed on a parcel due to "extraordinary circumstances" that do not generally apply to other lands in the vicinity, as required by ORS 215.705(2). Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 37 Or LUBA 844 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A county's findings of compliance with the stability standard are inadequate, where the county fails to explain or justify a study area that places the subject property at the margin of the identified study area, and excludes from the study large EFU-zoned parcels adjacent to the subject property. Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 37 Or LUBA 844 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A county's findings under the stability standard are inadequate, where the county fails to identify any uses on most of the EFU-zoned parcels within the study area, but merely assumes that the dominant land use in the area is residential because of the small size of most parcels and the fact that most dwellings in the area predated zoning restrictions. Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 37 Or LUBA 844 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A county's finding that a proposed lot of record dwelling on high-value soils will not materially alter the stability of the overall land use pattern is inadequate, where the county considers only the stability of the nonfarm land uses in the area, and fails to consider whether the proposed dwelling will encourage additional nonfarm development in a manner that destabilizes remaining farm uses. Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 37 Or LUBA 844 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a zoning ordinance standard requires consideration of residential appearance and function of an "area" in approving a bed and breakfast facility, and a hearings officer's findings use different areas in applying that criterion so that the analysis is internally inconsistent, the findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with the standard. Hatfield v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 664 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Required findings that a variance is "necessary" due to "special conditions or circumstances peculiar to the property" are inadequate, where the findings are equivocal about whether the problems identified are present and fail to explain why the cited problems could not be eliminated by redesigning the proposed subdivision or by eliminating one or more lots. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 37 Or LUBA 521 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's findings of compliance with a variance criterion that requires that the variance be "necessary for the proper development of the subdivision and the preservation of property rights and values," are inadequate where the findings do not identify any "property rights" or "property values" that would be threatened by the required 60-foot right-of-way or why the proposed subdivision could not be designed to accommodate the required 60-foot right-of-way. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 37 Or LUBA 521 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that dwellings can be built consistent with building setbacks are not responsive to a criterion that requires that the site be "suitable for the proposed use considering size, shape, location, topography and location of improvements and natural features." Robinson v. City of Silverton, 37 Or LUBA 521 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's finding of noncompliance with an approval criterion must suffice to explain to the applicant what steps need be taken to demonstrate compliance, or why the application cannot gain approval under that criterion. Ontrack, Inc. v. City of Medford, 37 Or LUBA 472 (2000).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that state there is "sufficient evidence in the form of oral testimony and documentation to support the application," and also state that existing adjacent parcels are "clustered around" two roads are insufficient to adequately describe the characteristics of adjacent lands and the uses located on them as required by OAR 660-004-0028(2)(b) and (6)(a). DLCD v. Wallowa County, 37 Or LUBA 105 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. City findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with flood hazard and storm water runoff requirements if they merely require the applicant to provide further studies to show that the runoff from the proposed development can be mitigated. Highland Condominium Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 37 Or LUBA 13 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A condition of approval that the applicant will provide a sanitary sewer capacity study and identify the location and ownership of utility infrastructure and easements does not demonstrate that adequate public utility systems are available or could be extended to service the proposed development as required by local ordinance. Highland Condominium Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 37 Or LUBA 13 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city's findings of compliance with conditional use criteria requiring that a "proposed use is consistent with the overall development character of the neighborhood with regard to building size, height, color, material and form" are conclusory and inadequate, where the city's findings do not describe either the boundaries or characteristics of the relevant neighborhood, but instead compare the proposed use to development in geographically distant parts of the city without explaining why those areas are part of the relevant neighborhood. Terra v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 582 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that the soils on the subject property are unsuitable for farm use is an inadequate, unexplained conclusion where the subject property is predominantly Class VI soils and the comprehensive plan provides that such soils have significant importance for grazing. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Committed exception findings must explain what it is about existing parcel size and ownership patterns that irrevocably commit resource land to nonresource use, specify the location of parcels created prior to application of the Goals, and distinguish those parcels created pursuant to the Goals. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Adequate findings regarding adjacent uses must specifically identify adjacent uses and explain what it is about the adjacent uses that make the farm use of the subject property impracticable. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Assuming that the existence of water and sewer lines on adjacent lands may be relevant to whether a property is irrevocably committed to nonresource use, findings must explain what that relevance is. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings addressing lands available for rural residential development need not consider residential land within urban growth boundaries. Land within urban growth boundaries is not rural land. Turrell v. Harney County, 36 Or LUBA 244 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A county's finding that a proposed nonforest dwelling is inconsistent with forest uses is inadequate where the finding is so conclusory that it fails to inform the applicant either what steps are necessary to obtain approval or that it is unlikely that the application can be approved. Eddings v. Columbia County, 36 Or LUBA 159 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A decision that offers only conclusory statements of compliance with an applicable zoning ordinance does not provide an adequate explanation of the basis for the local government's determination of compliance. Wood v. Crook County, 36 Or LUBA 143 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a city council interprets a code standard that excuses a permit applicant from providing required parking where "special circumstances exist constituting a hardship" as being satisfied where the cost of providing the one additional parking site that is possible on the property will constitute an "economic hardship out of proportion to the gain of parking spaces," and petitioner does not specifically challenge the city council's findings, LUBA will affirm that interpretation unless it exceeds the city's interpretive discretion under ORS 197.829(1). Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 68 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. An assignment of error challenging the adequacy of findings that an approval criterion is met must be denied, where the decision maker also adopts alternative findings that the approval criterion does not apply to the challenged permit application and those alternative findings are not challenged. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 68 (1999).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings are inadequate where a local government's decision makes conclusory statements of compliance with the applicable approval criteria without giving any factual or legal analysis to support the conclusion that the application complies with each of the criteria. Larvik v. City of La Grande, 34 Or LUBA 467 (1998).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In applying a local provision based on the no significant change/increased cost standard, the local government is not required to perform the impossible task of proving a negative or to quantify how much imposed conditions will reduce conflicts with farm uses below a certain threshold. It need only affirmatively consider the impacts of a proposed use on farm or forest practices, and in so doing, consider whether the use will force a significant change or significantly increase the cost of those practices. Gutoski v. Lane County, 34 Or LUBA 219 (1998).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local government's findings are supported in the record by substantial evidence, the findings will be considered sufficient even though there may also be evidence supporting the contrary position. Risher v. City of Portland, 33 Or LUBA 479 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The county's findings do not demonstrate that the subject property is irrevocably committed to non-resource uses where the findings describe the characteristics of the subject property, but do not explain what impact those characteristics have on the practicability of uses on the property. Brown v. Jefferson County, 33 Or LUBA 418 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that address neighborhood and regional characteristics under OAR 660-04-028(6)(d) by concluding that there will continue to be an increasing demand for additional rural residential homesites in the future are irrelevant to a conclusion that a committed exception is justified. Brown v. Jefferson County, 33 Or LUBA 418 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where, on remand, an applicant modifies a site plan for a gas station and car wash so that only the location of the gas pumps is carried forward from the original site plan to the modified site plan, a reasonable person could not conclude that the two plans are substantially similar. A finding that the plans are substantially similar does not adequately address the code requirements that apply to a site plan. Sullivan v. City of Woodburn, 33 Or LUBA 356 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A finding that an "exceptional circumstances" variance criterion is met because an existing substandard road cannot be improved to comply with the road standard without expanding the right-of-way is conclusory and inadequate. Elder v. Douglas County, 33 Or LUBA 276 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings of compliance with a variance criterion requiring that the variance be consistent with "the purposes" of the zoning ordinance, are inadequate where the findings fail to identify or discuss any of the three potentially applicable purpose sections in the zoning ordinance. Elder v. Douglas County, 33 Or LUBA 276 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a challenged decision does not discuss why granting a variance is the most effective method to relieve the special conditions of parcel size and shape, the findings do not establish that the variance meets local code requirements that special conditions apply to the subject property that "can be most effectively relieved by a variance." Shaffer v. City of Salem, 33 Or LUBA 57 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In applying a code approval standard that requires the identification of an area whose stability might be affected by a proposed development, the county's findings may not rely on inconsistent definitions of the area. Ray v. Douglas County, 32 Or LUBA 388 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A code approval standard that requires "a clear picture of the existing land use pattern" in a specified area is not satisfied by general findings about zoning and details about some of the properties in the area. Ray v. Douglas County, 32 Or LUBA 388 (1997).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Without findings explaining why, for purposes of a conditional use approval, a 13,660-square-foot church 33 feet high is "essentially the same size and height" as a "12,000 +/-"-square-foot church 29 feet high, LUBA cannot affirm that it is. Southeast Neighbors United v. Deschutes County, 32 Or LUBA 227 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In order to demonstrate compliance with ORS 215.296(1), county findings must: (1) describe the farm and forest practices on surrounding lands devoted to farm or forest use; explain why the proposed use will not force a significant change in those practices; and (3) explain why the proposed use will not significantly increase the cost of those practices. Brown v. Union County, 32 Or LUBA 168 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a hearings officer's interpretation of an applicable code provision is inadequate for review because it omits necessary analytical steps, this Board may make the determination of whether the county's decision is correct. Miller v. Clackamas County, 31 Or LUBA 104 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. County findings are inadequate when they fail to interpret an applicable local regulation, and fail to identify facts upon which the county relied in reaching its conclusions. LUBA will not overlook such inadequacies in the findings when no party cites evidence in the record that compels the interpretation and conclusion made by the county. DLCD v. Clatsop County, 31 Or LUBA 90 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a standard requires a comparison of the traffic or parking generated by a proposed use to the traffic or parking that normally occurs in the district, and the findings contain no such comparison or other factual support to establish the basis upon which the county reached its conclusion that the standard is satisfied, the findings are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence. Canfield v. Yamhill County, 31 Or LUBA 25 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government may find compliance with an applicable criterion by either (1) finding that the criterion is satisfied; or (2) finding that it is feasible to satisfy the criterion and imposing conditions necessary to insure compliance. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county acknowledges an incompatibility between a proposed nonfarm use and surrounding farm uses, it cannot determine that the proposed use satisfies the requirement that it be compatible through the imposition of a condition which will mitigate but not resolve the incompatibility. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Conditions of approval do not substitute for establishing compliance with applicable criteria; before the county can impose conditions of approval, it must first establish that the criteria can be satisfied. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local criterion requires that the county find a proposed use will not significantly reduce or impair significant wildlife, a finding that compliance with fencing specifications will "help the request comply" does not factually address or establish compliance with the criterion. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. To justify an irrevocably committed exception on forestland, the county must explain in findings why the facts upon which it relies lead to a conclusion that uses allowed by Goal 4 are impracticable. DLCD v. Coos County, 30 Or LUBA 229 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The county must itself analyze and evaluate relevant facts in its findings to show how it reached its decision; it cannot do that analysis for the first time in its brief to LUBA. DLCD v. Coos County, 30 Or LUBA 229 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Both Goal 4 and Goal 2 require the county to evaluate the practicability of all forest uses on the subject property before determining that such uses are impracticable and taking a committed exception. DLCD v. Coos County, 30 Or LUBA 229 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Because OAR 660-09-025(1) allows a fair degree of imprecision in both the number and acreage of sites needed to accommodate industrial and commercial uses, as well as broad site categories, it is not necessary in cases involving very minor changes in acreages to support Goal 9 findings with extensive analysis. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local government makes multiple findings, each showing compliance with a code criterion, the possibility that one such finding may be wrong is not critical to the final decision. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A city may not justify noncompliance with provisions of Goal 14 and policies in the city's own comprehensive plan on the ground that noncompliance is necessary to accommodate a particular development proposal. DLCD v. City of St. Helens, 29 Or LUBA 485 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county code provision requires that a temporary mobile home be connected to an existing septic system "if feasible" and the county acknowledges the applicants have not applied for the authorization necessary to determine such feasibility, the county's findings are inadequate to establish compliance with the applicable code provision. Collier v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 462 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The county's finding, made as part of its Goal 5 ESEE analysis, that an aggregate site located within a Big Game Habitat Range is not uniquely suited to wildlife must be supported by substantial evidence, not just a statement that the wildlife can "freely relocate" to other parts of the Big Game Habitat Range. Palmer v. Lane County, 29 Or LUBA 436 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. While a local government is required to identify in its findings the facts it relies upon in reaching its decision, it is not required to explain why it chose to balance conflicting evidence in a particular way, or to identify evidence it chose not to rely on. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. When the evidence in the record is conflicting, and the local government's findings fail to explain the basis for its conclusion or state which evidence it finds persuasive, LUBA must remand the decision for additional findings. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that state aggregate sites already on the comprehensive plan inventory are being depleted faster than expected, conclude there is a need to preserve additional aggregate sites to provide for long-term supply at multiple sites to protect the competitive nature of the aggregate market and explain why it is in the public interest that a competitive aggregate market be maintained, are sufficient to satisfy a code requirement that there be a "public need" to add the subject site to the plan inventory. O'Rourke v. Union County, 29 Or LUBA 303 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where, during a local government proceeding regarding the existence of a nonconforming use, specific issues were raised concerning whether a complete or partial interruption or abandonment of any nonconforming use of the subject property had occurred, findings that simply state use of the property has not been interrupted or abandoned are impermissibly conclusory. Suydam v. Deschutes County, 29 Or LUBA 273 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local government relies on particular features to assure compliance of a proposed use with approval standards, it must assure there is an adequate reason to assume such features actually will be part of the use. More than testimony by the applicant expressing willingness to provide such features is required. Penland v. Josephine County, 29 Or LUBA 213 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings which do not identify the ways a destination resort preliminary development plan is different from the previously approved conceptual site plan, the magnitude of such differences or why the local government believes the differences are minor, are not adequate to establish compliance with a code standard requiring the preliminary development plan to conform to the conceptual site plan and alterations, if any, to be minor in nature. Skrepetos v. Jackson County, 29 Or LUBA 193 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings supporting a local government decision that a proposed comprehensive plan amendment is a "major" plan amendment under the local code must explain the rationale for that conclusion. Quoting the code definition of "major" plan amendment and referring to unspecified principles or policies is not sufficient. Cone v. City of Eugene, 29 Or LUBA 133 (1995).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Identifying the area to be considered and the overall land use pattern of that area are prerequisites to determining whether a proposed partition satisfies a code requirement that it "not materially alter the stability of the land use pattern of the area." McNamara v. Union County, 28 Or LUBA 396 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In addressing the ORS 215.448(1)(c) requirement that a proposed home occupation "will not interfere with existing uses on nearby land or with other uses permitted in the zone in which the property is located," the local government must identify the uses permitted in the applicable zone. Holsheimer v. Columbia County, 28 Or LUBA 279 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings need not be perfect, and conditions may be imposed to assure compliance with approval standards. However, LUBA must be able to determine from the findings, conditions and evidence in the record that the relevant approval standards are met. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a code standard requires that conditional uses "preserve assets of particular interest to the community," local government findings supporting approval of a proposed conditional use must explain whether a natural feature that will be affected by the conditional use is such an asset and, if so, why the standard is satisfied. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 178 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Local government findings of compliance with an applicable approval standard must state the facts the local government relies on and explain why those facts lead to the conclusion that the standard is satisfied. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 28 Or LUBA 123 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. While a local government is required to identify in its findings the facts it relied upon in reaching its decision, it is not required to explain why it chose to balance conflicting evidence in a particular way, or to identify evidence it chose not to rely on. Melton v. City of Cottage Grove, 28 Or LUBA 1 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Arguments that approval of a fill permit violates local code provisions on fill in drainageways provide no basis for reversal or remand where (1) the local government adopted findings that the disputed fill was not placed in a drainageway, (2) those findings are supported by substantial evidence, and (3) petitioner does not specifically challenge the findings. Fechtig v. City of Albany, 27 Or LUBA 480 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings which identify a lack of evidence concerning road capacity and evidence concerning traffic congestion during weekend events at existing uses and a proposed agricultural/horticultural school complex are adequate to explain why a decision maker concluded the applicant failed to carry its burden concerning a code "minimal adverse impact" standard. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 27 Or LUBA 453 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. While it may be that findings of noncompliance with a relevant approval standard need not be as exhaustive or detailed as those necessary to establish compliance with that approval standard, a local government is obligated to provide an explanation for its conclusion that the standard is not met. Salem-Keizer School Dist. 24-J v. City of Salem, 27 Or LUBA 351 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In addressing a code requirement that a proposed conditional use satisfy state regulatory requirements, a local government determination that an exemption from certain state regulations applies must be reasonable. However, the local government need not establish that such a determination is correct. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings which identify some physical features and characteristics of an area, discuss planned improvements, and identify farm and nonfarm uses in the area do not establish the stability of the existing land use pattern of the area or explain why introducing a 120 lot residential planned unit development into the area will not materially alter that stability, as required by ORS 215.283(3)(c). DLCD v. Crook County, 26 Or LUBA 478 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings which identify facts relied on but fail to supply a rationale explaining why those facts led the local government to conclude a proposed livestock sale operation will not have significant adverse impacts on abutting properties are inadequate. Collins v. Klamath County, 26 Or LUBA 434 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a local government relies on particular features of a proposed use to assure compliance with approval standards, it must assure there is an adequate reason to assume such features actually will be part of the proposal. Collins v. Klamath County, 26 Or LUBA 434 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Petitioner's argument that the county failed to address evidence that escaped dogs can cause great damage in rural areas provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the county found the proposed kennel will comply with a code standard requiring no significant increase in the cost of accepted farm and forest practices because the design of the kennel will result in no dogs escaping from the facility. Larry Kelly Farms, Inc. v. Marion County, 26 Or LUBA 401 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a comprehensive plan contains no existing inventory of significant aggregate resource sites and imposes different standards for plan amendments, depending on whether the amendment is a plan text or a plan map amendment, the local government must explain in its decision its rationale in processing and approving a request to amend the plan to designate a site as a significant aggregate resource site as a plan text amendment. Nathan v. City of Turner, 26 Or LUBA 382 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government is under no obligation to specifically discuss in a challenged decision all of the evidence in the record or to explain its reasons for choosing to rely upon particular evidence over other evidence. City of Barlow v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Although the small size of a property may limit the size and impacts of a proposed development, and therefore provide a basis for explanatory findings demonstrating compliance with approval standards limiting development impacts, the decision approving such development may not simply cite the small size of the property and conclude the standards are met. Lucier v. City of Medford, 26 Or LUBA 213 (1994).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the challenged decision does not identify the characteristics of a proposed "soil remediation" use, or compare those characteristics with those of the listed, permitted uses in the applicable zone, the findings are inadequate to demonstrate the proposed "soil remediation" use is similar to the listed, permitted uses in the applicable zone. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 26 Or LUBA 181 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government decision that a shopping center may be allowed in a particular zone under code "similar use" provisions must (1) express an interpretation of the "similar use" provisions that is adequate for LUBA review, (2) actually apply the interpretation adopted, and (3) explain how the decision is consistent with that interpretation. Loud v. City of Cottage Grove, 26 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings determining compatibility between a proposed nonforest dwelling and forest uses are inadequate where the findings simply conclude no conflicts have occurred between existing dwellings and forest uses, but fail to establish the proximity between those existing dwellings and forest uses, and fail to establish whether the existing dwellings have buffering or other characteristics similar to those of the subject parcel. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the local code requires that a proposed driving range not alter the character of the surrounding area "in a manner which substantially limits, impairs or precludes the use of surrounding properties" for listed permitted uses, and findings acknowledge safety as a relevant consideration but simply rely upon the striking areas being more than 300 yards from adjacent properties to satisfy that safety consideration, the findings are inadequate to explain how the code standard is satisfied. Moore v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 40 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Although a county had in the past applied a predominance test so that a property was not designated forest where less than one half of the property qualified as forestlands, such a test is not required by Goal 4. Findings that explain such a test may result in large parcels containing significant acreage of forestland not being designated for forest use under Goal 4 are adequate to support a decision not to apply the predominance test. Westfair Associates Partnership v. Lane County, 25 Or LUBA 729 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A local government decision approving a permit will be remanded to the local government if the decision fails to (1) identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts believed and relied upon by the local decision maker, and (3) explain how those facts lead to a decision that the proposal complies with the approval standards. Lathrop v. Wallowa County, 25 Or LUBA 693 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. A variance criterion requiring that there be no reasonably practical alternatives to granting the variance is met where the local government finds the subdivision roadway necessitating the variance is needed for compliance with the comprehensive plan, and petitioners do not challenge that finding. Eola-Glen Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 672 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where a county code provision requires that there be no other "feasible location" for a proposed use, county findings that do not explain why identified alternative sites are not "feasible locations" for the proposed use are impermissibly conclusory, and LUBA will remand the challenged decision unless "the parties identify relevant evidence in the record which clearly supports" the county's decision in this regard. Simmons v. Marion County, 25 Or LUBA 647 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. In denying a request for permit approval, ORS 215.416(9) requires that a county provide an explanation of why the county believes the request fails to satisfy applicable standards. Where the required explanation is missing, LUBA will remand the decision. Ball and Associates v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 525 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where an applicable standard requires a determination that a proposed plan amendment complies with the plan, findings which state only that the proposal "appears" to satisfy the plan are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with that standard. Makepeace v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 370 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings explaining how the existing limited rural industrial uses near a proposed aggregate processing facility have not affected the historical stability of an EFU-zoned area, and that the existing and proposed industrial uses may discourage intrusion of rural residential development, are adequate to demonstrate compliance with an EFU zone "stability" standard. McKay Creek Valley Assoc. v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 238 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Where the challenged decision includes only a conclusory statement that detailed code criteria for PUD development plans are satisfied, and neither the decision itself nor the respondents' briefs explain how other findings addressing other code standards are adequate to demonstrate compliance with the PUD development plan criteria, LUBA cannot conclude the PUD development plan criteria are either satisfied or inapplicable to the subject proposal. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 25 Or LUBA 67 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. Findings that a proposed comprehensive plan map designation will offer more protection for resources identified in certain comprehensive plan policies than the existing plan map designation are adequate to support the change in plan designation, absent some explanation of why those findings are inadequate. Reeves v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 483 (1993).

1.4.4 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Explanation of Rationale. The requirement of OAR 660-16-005 for identification of conflicting uses is not satisfied by a local government finding that simply concludes, without explanation, that there are no potential conflicts between a Goal 5 resource site and existing uses. Gonzalez v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 251 (1992).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. Where a local government adopts independent findings and applies a different substantive analysis for two separate approval criteria, but relies on the same evidence in concluding that those criteria are not met, a petitioner does not effectively challenge the findings for one of those criteria by challenging the findings for the other so as to defeat an argument that it has failed to challenge all valid, alternative, and independent bases for denial. Himmelberger v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 367 (2019).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. LUBA will deny an assignment of error that alleges that the city's findings are inadequate to explain why a proposed PUD is "reasonably compatible and harmonious with adjacent nearby land uses" where the assignment of error fails to challenge all of the city's findings and instead selectively quotes and challenges only portions of the findings. Oakleigh-McClure Neighbors v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 132 (2014).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. The local governing body is entitled to some latitude in reconciling competing plan policies that address different but related needs regarding residential land use and housing, and findings are not inconsistent merely because they recognize some tension between the policies. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. A challenge to a single sentence that expresses a very broad view of the words "public need" in a comprehensive plan policy does not alone provide a basis for reversal or remand where the local government's decision is supported by almost three single-spaced pages of findings that explain the local government's reasoning. Hess v. City of Corvallis, 70 Or LUBA 283 (2014).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. An assignment of error that a decision maker erroneously characterized a nonconforming use application as an application to "change" rather than "expand" the nonconforming use does not provide a basis for reversal or remand, where the local approval criteria for both changes and expansions require a finding of no greater adverse impacts, and petitioner does not challenge findings that the proposed change/expansion results in greater adverse impacts. Campers Cove Resort v. Jackson County, 61 Or LUBA 62 (2010).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. Where a local government adopts findings regarding a code provision that contains language that is almost identical to the challenged code provision and that requires the same analysis as the challenged code provision, those findings may be relied on to demonstrate compliance with both code provisions. Greenhalgh v. Columbia County, 54 Or LUBA 626 (2007).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. Findings demonstrating compliance with an approval criterion that requires that a proposed RV park be compatible with surrounding residential areas based, in part, on vegetative screening are not sufficient to demonstrate compliance with a comprehensive plan policy requiring buffer zones between residential areas and conflicting land uses. Jacobsen v. City of Winston, 51 Or LUBA 602 (2006).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. Finding compliance with an approval standard by incorporating findings that address other standards may be insufficient where the standards are not identical and the findings do not address the differences. Sisters Forest Planning Comm. v. Deschutes County, 48 Or LUBA 78 (2004).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. While it might be error for a local government to rely on findings demonstrating compliance with a less rigorous "balancing" standard to demonstrate compliance with a more rigorous "no adverse impact" standard, the reverse is not necessarily true: the local government may be able to rely on findings of compliance with the more rigorous standard to demonstrate compliance with a less rigorous standard. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. A local government may adopt a single set of findings addressing two code compatibility standards, as long as the findings are adequate to demonstrate that both standards are met. Nelson v. Curry County, 47 Or LUBA 196 (2004).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. A proposal to swap plan designations for two portions of a single parcel does not require separate findings addressing each portion, where the applicable plan amendment criteria do not necessarily require separate findings, and petitioner does not identify any meaningful difference between the two areas that would require separate consideration. Excelsior Investment Co. v. City of Medford, 44 Or LUBA 553 (2003).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. A standard requiring that a proposed use be compatible with the surrounding area is not the same as a standard requiring that a proposed use be compatible with farm and forest uses in the area and not interfere with farm or forest practices. A county cannot rely on findings of compliance with one standard to also find compliance with the other, without addressing the differences between the two standards or explaining why compliance with one also demonstrates compliance with the other. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. A finding that the subject property contains no identified Goal 5 resources is not adequate to address the Goal 4 requirement that "other forested lands" be designated as forest lands if such lands are needed to maintain soil, water, air, fish and wildlife resources. DLCD v. Curry County, 33 Or LUBA 728 (1997).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. That the findings supporting the challenged decision are similar or identical to those adopted in a previous local government decision based on a different site plan does not, of itself, provide a basis for reversal or remand. Horizon Construction, Inc. v. City of Newberg, 28 Or LUBA 632 (1995).

1.4.5 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Related Findings. Where the challenged decision includes only a conclusory statement that detailed code criteria for PUD development plans are satisfied, and neither the decision itself nor the respondents' briefs explain how other findings addressing other code standards are adequate to demonstrate compliance with the PUD development plan criteria, LUBA cannot conclude the PUD development plan criteria are either satisfied or inapplicable to the subject proposal. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 25 Or LUBA 67 (1993).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a local government approves a liquefied natural gas (LNG) terminal to and from which tankers will be required to transit an estuary, and where the United States Coast Guard declares that it will impose a mobile "security zone" around each tanker, extending 500 yards on each side, from which all other vessels are generally excluded, findings that the security zone will not substantially interfere with public trust rights in the estuary are inadequate where they do not address testimony that two jetties at the mouth of the estuary form a relatively narrow channel and that tankers and large fleets of fishing vessels may need to transit the mouth of the estuary at the same time, at or near high tide. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 81 Or LUBA 839 (2020).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In the absence of countervailing expert testimony, LUBA will accept farmers' contention that compliance with an EPA rule prescribing an Application Exclusion Zone (AEZ) for outdoor pesticide application is an accepted farm practice for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), regardless of whether it is applicable law, and a county errs by not analyzing the impacts of approving a recreational area on EFU land with respect to the EPA AEZ. Schrepel v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 895 (2020).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a governing body concludes that a proposed hotel complies with a comprehensive plan provision requiring that such proposals have "no adverse impact" on the function of a nearby wildlife refuge, arguments at LUBA that the governing body improperly focused on impacts related to the operation of the hotel and did not consider impacts associated with demolition of an existing motel and construction of the new hotel provide no basis for reversal or remand where the petitioner did not clarify why demolition and construction were relevant or specify the adverse impacts of concern in their local appeal statement. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Bandon, 81 Or LUBA 285 (2020).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government's erroneous statement in the findings that it was not required to consider the petitioner's testimony does not establish that the local government committed procedural error where other findings establish that the local government did consider that testimony. ODOT v. Grant County, 80 Or LUBA 192 (2019).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a local government adopts independent findings and applies a different substantive analysis for two separate approval criteria, but relies on the same evidence in concluding that those criteria are not met, a petitioner does not effectively challenge the findings for one of those criteria by challenging the findings for the other so as to defeat an argument that it has failed to challenge all valid, alternative, and independent bases for denial. Himmelberger v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 367 (2019).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Approving a boundary line adjustment to a parcel under applicable standards does not "collaterally attack" a previous land partition decision that originally created the subject parcel under different standards, even assuming the adjusted parcel after the boundary line adjustment would not comply with the partition standards that were applied earlier when the parcel was created. Friends of Douglas County v. Douglas County, 78 Or LUBA 11 (2018).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When LUBA has affirmed at least one valid basis for denial the Board typically does not address challenges directed at other, alternate, bases for denial. Such an action would result in rendering what are essentially advisory adjudications, which is not consistent with the statutory mandate that LUBA's review should be conducted pursuant to sound principles of judicial review. ORS 197.805. Yamhill Creek Solar, LLC v. Yamhill County, 78 Or LUBA 245 (2018).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When local code sets out independent grounds for granting a variance, and when only one of three rezoning criteria must be met in order to grant a rezoning, and the city adequately demonstrated that one criterion was satisfied, LUBA need not consider arguments relating to the other two criteria. American Tower Corp v. City of Tualatin, 78 Or LUBA 350 (2018).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A finding that the applicant qualifies as a "farm operator" as defined at OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a) is inadequate, where the finding merely assumes the applicant is the farm operator, and does not address issues raised below that the applicant leases the land to a third person who is the actual farm operator. Richards v. Jefferson County, 77 Or LUBA 152 (2018).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A hearings officer's failure to expressly interpret ambiguous code language is not, by itself, a basis for remand, where the hearings officer's decision primarily addressed a different issue raised by petitioner and LUBA agrees with the interpretation of that code language that is included in the county's response brief. Brannon v. Multnomah County, 77 Or LUBA 275 (2018).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A city's conclusion that zoning ordinance text amendments are consistent with the city's comprehensive plan policy which requires city to "maximize * * * intermodal transportation linkages" because the amendments will not affect the city's supply of land zoned for economic or industrial use is not responsive to the language of the comprehensive plan policy objective. On its face, a city's zoning ordinance which prohibits new and expanded intermodal fossil fuel transportation facilities appears to be inconsistent with the comprehensive plan policy objective language, and this apparent inconsistency requires some analysis and a direct explanation. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In granting design review approval, whether the use for which design review approval is a permitted use in the applicable zoning district is a relevant issue, and when that issue is raised and the city fails to address that issue in its findings, remand is required for the city to adopt findings addressing the issue. Glenwood 2006, LLC v. City of Beaverton, 76 Or LUBA 162 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where parties raise legitimate questions about how a study area will be used to calculate residential density and the local government fails to address those questions when it adopts the amendments governing use of the study area, the study area does not comply with the OAR 660-023-0050(1) requirement for "specific standards," or the OAR 660-023-0050(2) requirement for "clear and objective" standards. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Crook County, 76 Or LUBA 396 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings regarding the adequacy of urban services to serve annexed property are inadequate, where the findings cite only hearsay statements from providers, and fail to address issues raised below regarding delayed response times to service the subject property and an engineer's testimony that the electrical system cannot serve the property without impacting other portions of the city. J4J Misc PAC v. City of Jefferson, 75 Or LUBA 120 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Under an annexation requirement that the city must find that "sufficient planning and engineering data is available" and "all necessary studies and reviews have been completed such that there are no unresolved issues," a city's conclusory finding of compliance is inadequate in the face of detailed and unrebutted testimony that studies are required regarding impacts of proposed development on traffic, pedestrian and bicycle facilities, storm water drainage, flooding, electrical infrastructure, and emergency access. J4J Misc PAC v. City of Jefferson, 75 Or LUBA 120 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a petitioner challenges the adequacy of a county's findings that a small wind turbine is of the same general character as "communication towers, utility substations and transmission lines," arguing that the findings do not address the wind turbines' moving propellers, which the other uses do not have, but the findings in fact do address the moving propellers and provide a reason why the county did not believe that difference makes the wind turbines of a different "general character," LUBA will reject petitioner's findings challenge. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 75 Or LUBA 350 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Adequate findings must (1) identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts which are believed and relied upon, and (3) explain how those facts lead to the conclusion that the approval standards are met; but adequate findings need not necessarily address evidence that conflicts with the evidence the local government chooses to rely upon, or explain why the decision-maker chose not to rely upon evidence that conflicts with the evidence it did choose to rely upon. Kine v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 419 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a governing body disagrees with a hearings officer regarding the applicability of a master plan to proposed development, the governing body is not obligated to adopt findings addressing the hearings officer's reasoning on that point. The findings are adequate as long as they explain the governing body's reasoning for reaching the opposite conclusion. Kine v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 419 (2017).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a hearings officer's finding takes inconsistent positions regarding the nature of the legal issue to be resolved in proceedings following a LUBA remand of a permit approval for a destination resort, a second remand is required. Central Land and Cattle Company, LLC v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 326 (2016).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a relevant issue is adequately raised in a land use proceeding, the findings supporting the final decision must address the issue and where the findings do not do so, remand is required. Space Age Fuel, Inc. v. Umatilla County, 72 Or LUBA 92 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a local code provision requires a determination that "[o]n balance, the proposed lots will have dimensions that are consistent with the purpose of this section," and the section provides for nine purposes to be considered, a city may be able to assign greater or lesser significance to a particular purpose based on direction from the city's code, comprehensive plan or other land use document. But a city errs to the extent that it interprets the "on balance" determination to allow denial based solely on a finding of inconsistency with one or two of the nine purposes, without considering consistency with all of the purposes. Sage Equities, LLC v. City of Portland, 72 Or LUBA 163 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. LUBA will remand for more adequate findings where a city finds that a stormwater conveyance system constructed to city standards will minimize potential adverse impacts of stormwater pollutants on estuarine fish resources, where the finding does not describe potential adverse impacts, address expert testimony regarding those impacts, or explain why compliance with city stormwater construction standards is sufficient to minimize potential adverse impacts. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is required where a city's only finding responding to testimony that pesticides and herbicides runoff from residential development will harm fish in the adjacent estuary is that pesticides and herbicides will not be applied within a riparian buffer, but the finding does not address runoff from the residential development itself, and no condition is imposed that prohibits application of pesticides or herbicides within the riparian buffer. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Absent a land use regulation or other applicable law that requires a county to address compliance with state or federal archeological and cultural preservation laws in approving an application for a mining use, or to impose conditions requiring compliance with such laws if archeological or cultural sites are discovered during mining, the county does not err in failing to adopt such findings or impose such a condition. Rogue Advocates v. Josephine County, 72 Or LUBA 275 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A finding that mining will not conflict with deer and elk winter range on the subject property, because resident deer and elk will adjust to noise from mining and truck traffic on the property, is insufficient to address issues raised regarding impacts of truck traffic on deer and elk migration routes off the property, including the increased potential for collisions between trucks and deer and elk migrating across the county road. Rogue Advocates v. Josephine County, 72 Or LUBA 275 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where a county fails to address whether a comprehensive plan policy requiring the county to ensure that incompatible uses are not established "adjacent" to historic sites is violated by a proposal to run heavy trucks close to, but not across, a historic bridge, based on testimony that the truck traffic would make it unsafe for tourists and school groups to park and visit the bridge. Because there is no local interpretation of what "adjacent" means, and remand is required for other reasons, LUBA will remand the decision for the county to interpret the plan policy in the first instance, rather than interpret the plan policy on its own. Rogue Advocates v. Josephine County, 72 Or LUBA 275 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A board of county commissioners does not err in failing to address a petitioner's argument that is inconsistent with a thirteen-year-old board of commissioners' interpretation of a different LC provision. Head v. Lane County, 72 Or LUBA 411 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where the findings conclude that the water supply is "adequate" to support proposed residential development because a main water line is located adjacent to the property, but do not address the code requirement to address the availability of water "relative to capacity," and the findings and record do not address capacity or issues raised about the capacity to serve new development while meeting existing obligations. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 71 Or LUBA 14 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings are inadequate to establish that rezoning land adjacent to an estuary to allow for urban residential development is consistent with Goal 16, where federal agencies testified that development allowed under the rezone would adversely affect estuarine resources, but the findings do not address that testimony, or evaluate impacts of development on the estuary as Goal 16, Implementation Requirement 1 requires. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 71 Or LUBA 14 (2015).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a county's decision modifies the alignment of a portion of a transmission pipeline that was approved in 2009, the county's findings need not address challenges raised by a landowner regarding impacts of a different portion of the pipeline, the alignment of which is not modified. Because the modification decision approves no modification of that portion of the pipeline, such challenges are collateral attacks on the 2009 decision. McLaughlin v. Douglas County, 70 Or LUBA 314 (2014).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where, based on Natural Resources Conservation Service data, opponents take the position that the water table lies two feet below the surface of a proposed topsoil mining operation, but the local government accepts the applicant's position that the water table lies 125 feet below the surface, but no party identifies the evidence the applicant and local government relied on for the 125-foot estimate, LUBA will remand the decision so that the county can adopt findings explaining the large discrepancy in the two estimates and why it accepted the 125-foot estimate. Tolbert v. Clackamas County, 70 Or LUBA 388 (2014).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where a conditional use permit approval standard requires a comparison of the adverse impacts of the proposed mining use on abutting properties with the impacts of development permitted outright on the abutting properties, but the local government findings compare only the impacts of proposed and existing mining and do not consider the impacts of uses permitted outright. Dion v. Baker County, 70 Or LUBA 438 (2014).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is required where the findings fail to address issues raised by an economist's report that economic impacts of construction on businesses are inadequately mitigated, where the report is the only evidence in the record that attempts to quantify economic impacts, and the findings do not address the report or the issue raised, or explain why that issue need not be considered under the approval criteria. STOP Tigard Oswego Project, LLC v. City of West Linn, 68 Or LUBA 360 (2013).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. The findings denying an application for a quasi-judicial zoning and comprehensive plan map amendment are adequate, where they explain that the two commissioners who participated in the decision could not agree whether the application satisfied two approval criteria and that by operation of law that failure to achieve a majority vote in favor of the application results in denial. The county was not required to adopt findings that are adequate to deny the application on the merits, where the decision does not deny the application on the merits. Warren v. Josephine County, 67 Or LUBA 74 (2013).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings that batching operations on property zoned exclusive farm use that would be prohibited under ORS 215.301(2) are authorized under ORS 215.301(2) and a 1981 permit are inadequate where the findings do not respond to arguments that a 1997 permit modified the 1981 permit to disallow batching operations. Poto v. Linn County, 67 Or LUBA 162 (2013).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a variance standard requires that the applicant demonstrate that the "hardship was not created by the person requesting the variance," and an issue is raised below that no "hardship" exists in reducing the number of required bicycle parking spaces, the decision maker must adopt findings identifying the hardship to the extent necessary to apply the variance criteria. CRAW v. City of Warrenton, 67 Or LUBA 263 (2013).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a zoning amendment standard requires that the city shall consider the comprehensive plan, and the city's transportation system plan proposes a pedestrian crossing near the rezoned property that the applicant's traffic engineer testified may require changes to the proposed development, but the findings do not address the issue, remand is necessary for the city to consider the issue or explain why no such consideration is warranted under the zoning amendment standard. Save Downtown Canby v. City of Canby, 67 Or LUBA 385 (2013).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings supporting a legislative decision that amends the Oregon Highway Plan to provide a process for modifying mobility standards need not address issues raised below regarding whether future decisions approving higher mobility standards will cause increased congestion of specific transportation facilities and increase pollution contrary to Goal 6, where Goal 6 will apply directly to any future decisions approving higher mobility standards for specific transportation facilities, and such issues cannot be meaningfully addressed in a legislative decision adopting general amendments to the Oregon Highway Plan. Setniker v. ODOT, 66 Or LUBA 54 (2012).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Goal 9 requires local governments to provide adequate opportunities for a variety of economic activities, but does not require local governments to protect one type of economic activity against impacts created by other economic and non-economic uses. Goal 9 does not require that ODOT, in adopting higher mobility standards for state highways, address in its findings whether increased congestion from development allowed under the higher mobility standards will adversely affect existing economic activity. Setniker v. ODOT, 66 Or LUBA 54 (2012).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. The Goal 11 requirement to provide "timely, orderly and efficient arrangement of public facilities and services" is not particularly concerned with the performance standards governing state highways, a concern that is more specifically addressed under Goal 12 and the Transportation Planning Rule. Goal 11 does not add anything new or different to the specific Goal 12 requirements with respect to the performance of state highways, and findings addressing Goal 11 are not inadequate simply because they fail to consider whether modified highway performance standards are consistent with Goal 11. Setniker v. ODOT, 66 Or LUBA 54 (2012).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Although evidence in the record might provide a basis for a hearings officer to adopt findings that respond to an issue raised about the potential impact of a proposed aggregate mine on an existing wildlife corridor, where the decision on appeal does not include findings addressing that issue, the decision must be remanded for the hearings officer to adopt responsive findings. Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where an applicant's engineering report and environmental consultant identified technical and engineering challenges and public health and safety issues associated with several alternatives to replacing a currently failing waste water treatment system that are independent of the costs of replacing that system, the county's findings are inadequate to explain its conclusion that an applicant considered only the cost of replacing the existing waste water treatment system in eliminating other alternative facility options. Falcon Heights WSD v. Klamath County, 64 Or LUBA 390 (2011).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A petitioner at LUBA who alleges a land use decision should be remanded because a local government failed to address a relevant issue must (1) identify the issue raised, (2) demonstrate the issue was adequately raised, and (3) establish the issue is relevant to applicable approval criteria in some way. A petitioner who simply refers to 86 pages of single spaced written argument below fails to carry that burden. Rosenzweig v. City of McMinnville, 64 Or LUBA 402 (2011).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A criterion that requires a local government to find that a proposed dwelling will not force a significant change in accepted farm practices on surrounding lands does not require the local government to address the indirect and speculative possibility that the owner of the land on which the proposed dwelling will be located may decide in the future not to lease any portions of the subject property that may have been available for leasing for grazing in the past. Womelsdorf v. Jackson County, 62 Or LUBA 34 (2010).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. OAR 660-033-0030(2) and (3) require consideration of adjoining and nearby lands, in determining whether property is suitable for grazing and hence qualifies as agricultural land OAR 660-033-0020(1)(a)(B). Remand is necessary, where the record indicates that adjoining properties support seasonal grazing operations and have similar soils and conditions to the subject property, but the county does not adopt findings considering those adjoining properties or explain why the subject property cannot reasonably be used for seasonal grazing. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 62 Or LUBA 80 (2010).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a county hearings officer's findings show she was persuaded that additional mitigation measures were necessary to address thermal impacts of destination resort groundwater use on a nearby cool water creek, the hearings officer's decision to accept the applicant's proposal to provide additional mitigation by reducing surface withdrawal from that cool water creek is inadequate where there was opposition testimony that the proposed mitigation would not mitigate the thermal impact. While there may be a simple answer to the opposition testimony, where that answer is missing in the record and the hearings officer's decision does not address that opposition testimony, the decision must be remanded. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary to address testimony from a neighboring rancher that noise from blasting rock at a proposed quarry will force a significant change in or significantly increase the cost of ranching practices, where the findings do not address that testimony or noise impacts in general, but instead rely on fencing and a 200-foot buffer area to conclude that mining would not impact nearby grazing operations. Walker v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 488 (2009).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. LUBA will affirm a county's finding that fire protection measures that typically apply to logging operations are sufficient to ensure that a proposed mining operation in a forest zone will not significantly increase fire hazards, notwithstanding that a permanent mining operation will have greater duration and intensity than a seasonal logging operation, where the petitioners cite to no evidence substantiating their assertion that the nature and intensity of the mining operation require more stringent fire protection measures than logging operations. Comden v. Coos County, 56 Or LUBA 214 (2008).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the Goal 5 program requires that the riparian setback be determined from the "top of high bank," as characterized by "an abrupt or noticeable change from a steeper grade to a less steep grade," a hearings officer errs in locating the top of high bank without addressing whether the location is characterized by an abrupt or noticeable change in grade. The Piculell Group v. City of Eugene, 56 Or LUBA 298 (2008).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where one element of the test for determining the location of top of high bank is contingent on a finding that "natural conditions prevail," but the hearings officer locates the top of high bank under that element without finding or explaining why "natural conditions prevail." The Piculell Group v. City of Eugene, 56 Or LUBA 298 (2008).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where the city attorney concludes in an enforcement action that intervenor's use of land is unlawful on two separate grounds, and the city council reverses the city attorney's decision on one ground and approves the use of land, but does not address the second ground for concluding that the use of land is unlawful. Fessler v. City of Fossil, 55 Or LUBA 1 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife (ODFW) testifies that that county's Goal 5 program to protect Other Winter Range relies upon resource zoning to limit residential density, and the findings do not address that testimony or explain why the county believes it can rezone Other Winter Range land to nonresource use without amending the county's Goal 5 program, LUBA will remand the decision to address the issue. Lofgren v. Jackson County, 55 Or LUBA 126 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the county criteria that govern division of EFU-zoned land require that parcels be 160 acres or larger and require that divisions of EFU-zoned land comply with applicable comprehensive plan policies, and partition opponents argue that dividing an EFU-zoned parcel into parcels that are smaller than 160 acres violates those criteria and plan policies, the county's decision will be remanded where the county fails to address those arguments. Friends of Umatilla County v. Umatilla County, 55 Or LUBA 330 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A city's failure to find that it is feasible to construct a driveway without encroaching on adjacent property is not a basis for remand, where the applicable criteria require no finding of feasibility, and the petitioner identifies no physical or other impediment to constructing the driveway without encroachment. Brodersen v. City of Ashland, 55 Or LUBA 350 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. An equipment shed may or may not be allowed as part of a utility, where the zoning ordinance defines a "building," in part, as a "structure" and allows utilities in all zones but prohibits such utilities from including a "building." Because the zoning ordinance distinguishes between "structures" and "accessory structures," the issue becomes whether the equipment shed qualifies as an "accessory structure" and whether the prohibition is limited to "structures" and does not extend to "accessory structures." Skyliner Summit at Broken Top v. City of Bend, 54 Or LUBA 316 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where the local government's approval of an asphalt batch plant fails to address issues raised regarding the impact of emissions on especially sensitive crops grown nearby. Rickreall Community Water Assoc. v. Polk County, 53 Or LUBA 76 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings concluding that a total variance from a code requirement to provide 10 off-street parking spaces is the "minimum necessary to alleviate the hardship" are inadequate, where the findings fail to address whether an adjacent site could provide at least some of the required 10 parking spaces. Grant v. City of Depoe Bay, 53 Or LUBA 214 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When a local government imposes a condition of approval based on a code provision regarding excessive demand created by a proposed development, but the local government does not find that the proposed development will cause excessive demand, ignores the developer's proposed interpretation of excessive demand, and does not provide its own interpretation, the decision must be remanded. PacWest II, Inc. v. City of Madras, 53 Or LUBA 241 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In applying a compatibility standard a county does not err by failing to consider whether subdivision covenants, conditions and restrictions prohibit cell towers, where (1) it is not possible to determine if the covenants, conditions and restrictions were adopted to achieve compatibility, (2) there is a dispute about whether the covenants, conditions and restrictions apply, and (3) the county is not the body with jurisdiction to determine whether the covenants, conditions and restrictions apply. Clark v. Coos County, 53 Or LUBA 325 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In applying a compatibility standard, a county does not err in failing to consider evidence about the impact the proposed use may have on property values, where the evidence is conflicting and the development code does not list impact on property values as a mandatory consideration in applying the compatibility standard. Clark v. Coos County, 53 Or LUBA 325 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a rezoning opponent specifically cites and quotes comprehensive plan policies and argues the proposed rezoning is inconsistent with those policies, it is generally risky for a local government to approve the rezoning without specially addressing the cited comprehensive plan policies. However, where the petitioner makes no attempt to tie his substantive arguments to the cited plan policies and the city's responsive findings adequately address petitioner's substantive arguments, the city's failure to tie its responsive findings to the cited plan policies is not important. Ettro v. City of Warrenton, 53 Or LUBA 485 (2007).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where planned unit development subdivision opponents argued before the city that the proposal was inconsistent with a number of comprehensive plan provisions, and it is not clear why at least some of those comprehensive plan requirements are not relevant approval requirements, the city erred by not addressing those comprehensive plan provisions in its findings and explaining why they do not apply as approval requirements or why the proposal is consistent with those requirements if they do apply. Wasserburg v. City of Dunes City, 52 Or LUBA 70 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a city adjustment committee lacks authority to consider a legal issue, the adjustment committee does not err by failing to address that legal issue in its findings, even though petitioners raised the legal issue below. O'Brien v. City of Portland, 52 Or LUBA 113 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. While it may be error to adopt findings of compliance with Goal 16 that consider only the positive economic benefits of the plan amendment without considering countervailing evidence of negative impacts, petitioners demonstrate no such error where the local government in fact considered the countervailing evidence and rejected it as unpersuasive and speculative. People for Responsible Prosperity v. City of Warrenton, 52 Or LUBA 181 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where specific criticisms of a transportation impact analysis are made, silence or continued support of the transportation impact analysis by the city engineer and Oregon Department of Transportation engineers is not sufficient to refute those issues. Ignoring issues is not the same thing as implicitly refuting those issues. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a county interprets its code to require submittal of expert studies to more precisely establish the boundary of a significant natural resource area, a hearings officer may consider expert studies from the applicant and opponents, accept and reject parts of both studies, and require protection of a natural resource area that is smaller than proposed by opponents and larger than proposed by the applicant. Kyle v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 399 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A finding that expansion of an existing stormwater facility will improve problems with the existing facility, combined with a condition of approval requiring that the expanded facility not exacerbate existing problems, is sufficient to address concerns raised by petitioner that the expanded facility might exacerbate existing overflow problems. Bollam v. Clackamas County, 52 Or LUBA 738 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where on remand from LUBA the applicant withdraws a proposal for owner-occupancy that prompted the remand, that withdrawal moots that issue, and a finding to that effect is adequate to dispose of the issue on remand. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 51 Or LUBA 188 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings supporting a variance approval are not inadequate merely because they do not quote verbatim the applicable approval criteria; petitioners must explain how the "summary" of the applicable provision makes the findings inadequate or how the city misapplied the criteria. Spooner v. City of Salem, 51 Or LUBA 237 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a variance criterion requires the city to find that "public need" outweighs "adverse impacts" of developing wetlands and a party argues there is no market demand for the commercial development that the variance would allow, the city must address in its findings the role, if any, that market demand plays under the variance criterion and explain why the public need, as the city interprets those words, outweighs the identified potential adverse impacts. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 51 Or LUBA 363 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a variance criterion requires the city to find that "public need" outweighs "adverse impacts" of developing wetlands and a party identifies many potential adverse impacts of such development, a city's findings must do more than explain how the potential adverse impacts will be mitigated; the findings must explain why the public need outweighs the potential adverse impacts, as they may be mitigated. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 51 Or LUBA 363 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a city council adopts as findings the application for approval of an RV park on a 3.5-acre parcel in a zone with a 10-acre minimum lot size, and those findings do not address petitioner's assertion at the local hearing that applicant must obtain a variance to the minimum lot size requirement, remand is appropriate for the city council to adopt findings addressing that issue. Jacobsen v. City of Winston, 51 Or LUBA 602 (2006).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings supporting a zone change are inadequate where they fail to address portions of the applicable approval criterion because the findings misquote the applicable zone change approval criterion, omitting language that refers to needed housing and requires that added emphasis be given to the comprehensive plan's housing policies. Premier Development v. City of McMinnville, 50 Or LUBA 666 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a petitioner argues at the local level that the Transportation Planning Rule (TPR) applies to the challenged decision because a condition of approval of a previous zone change arguably requires application of the TPR, the decision maker is required to at least address the issue in its decision and explain why the TPR does not apply. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Medford, 49 Or LUBA 52 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings that a text amendment adding a new use to a park zone are inadequate to address protection of historic sites under Goal 5, where the findings address only one of several parks with historic sites, and fail to explain why allowing a new potentially conflicting use on or near historic sites is consistent with Goal 5. Cox v. Polk County, 49 Or LUBA 78 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A hearings officer errs in approving a cul-de-sac under subdivision criteria that allow a cul-de-sac only where existing development on adjacent property prevents a street connection and a connected street pattern is not possible, where (1) the "existing development" is on the same property being subdivided, (2) there is evidence that a street connection is possible, and (3) there are no findings explaining why a street connection is not possible. Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the approved tentative plat does not propose curbs on a private street, but the hearings officer's findings suggest that curbs will be provided to direct storm water to catch basins and there is expert testimony that curbs are necessary to direct storm water to catch basins, remand is necessary to address whether the decision requires curbs and, if not, how storm water will be directed to catch basins. Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the decision approves a cul-de-sac that may be longer than 600 feet, depending on how the "block" is measured, remand is necessary to explain how the blocks created by the cul-de-sac comply with a subdivision approval standard prohibiting blocks longer than 600 feet as measured between the centerline of "through cross streets." Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A finding that lands within a UGB are "unavailable" for a proposed public storage facility is inadequate, where the county fails to address evidence that there is a large surplus of vacant industrial and commercial lands within the UGB that allow public storage facilities, and there is no basis to conclude that such lands are not "available." Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 49 Or LUBA 529 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary where, on remand from LUBA, the local government approves unspecified modifications to an approved site plan without addressing issues raised on remand regarding whether those modifications are consistent with applicable criteria. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 466 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government's failure to address issues raised regarding whether an enhanced wetland project is consistent with the purpose of the EFU zone is at most harmless error, where petitioners do not explain why the purpose statement is an approval criterion. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a planning department finds that a proposed home occupation would violate two of twelve home occupation standards and following a local appeal a hearings official finds the proposed home occupation would not violate those two standards, assignments of error in a LUBA appeal of the hearings official decision that allege the home occupation would violate other standards that neither the planning department nor the hearings official considered provide no basis for reversal or remand, where the petitioners cite no legal authority that would compel the hearings official to render a complete adjudication concerning all home occupation standards. Revoal v. City of Eugene, 47 Or LUBA 136 (2004).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When a petitioner raises an issue concerning a specific comprehensive plan provision, a local government is obligated to explain the extent to which, if any, the provision applies to the decision. Doob v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 147 (2004).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a city transportation plan assigns responsibility to the city engineer to determine the scope of a traffic study necessary to assess development impacts on "nearby key intersections," the city engineer's decision to limit the traffic study to intersections adjacent to the subject property and not to require study of intersections five blocks away is not a basis for reversal or remand, absent an explanation from petitioners as to why those intersections are both "nearby" and "key." Heilman v. City of Corvallis, 47 Or LUBA 305 (2004).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where approval of an adjustment to create an oversize tract of land must not significantly detract from the livability or appearance of the residential area, a city commits no error in limiting its analysis to the oversize tract and declining to consider the possible impacts of developing another proposed tract that does not require a maximum lot size adjustment. South v. City of Portland, 46 Or LUBA 558 (2004).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. While a county need not address every possible farm use defined under ORS 215.203(2)(a) in adopting a committed exception to Goal 3, when a party below identifies a particular farm use that may be practicable, the county must address the practicability of that farm use. Friends of Douglas County v. Douglas County, 46 Or LUBA 757 (2004).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. There is no generally applicable rule that in approving a land use proposal a local government must find that the proposal complies with state permitting requirements or that it is feasible for the proposal to comply with state permitting requirements. Paddock v. Yamhill County, 45 Or LUBA 39 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government's failure to adopt findings addressing the potential impacts a subdivision will have on nearby wells and whether the applicant will be able to secure required state permits for its water supply could only provide a basis for remand by LUBA if there is some legal requirement that the local government adopt such findings. Paddock v. Yamhill County, 45 Or LUBA 39 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a site design review purpose statement includes a requirement that decision makers "consider" certain impacts caused by a proposed site design, including impacts on neighboring land values, the decision must address issues that parties raise about those impacts, notwithstanding the fact that none of the approval criteria specifically require that impacts on neighboring land values be addressed. Freeland v. City of Bend, 45 Or LUBA 125 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A city's findings that a proposed annexation is consistent with applicable annexation policies that require a showing that (1) adequate public facilities are available to serve the property; (2) the proposed annexation is needed; and (3) the annexation will result in a compact growth pattern, are not adequate when they fail to address petitioner's arguments that (1) not all of the needed public facilities have been determined to be available; (2) that the annexation is not needed because there is an abundance of available land within city limits; and (3) the annexation will not result in a compact growth pattern because it will result in a bulge in city limits that is almost entirely surrounded by unincorporated territory. Friends of Linn County v. City of Lebanon, 45 Or LUBA 204 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A county does not commit reversible error by failing to expressly reject a party's interpretative argument, where it is clear that the county implicitly rejected that interpretive argument. Underhill v. Wasco County, 45 Or LUBA 566 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a code provision appears to require analysis of cumulative impacts of development proposals, but the city's decision does not address cumulative impacts and the city's response brief fails to explain why no cumulative impact analysis is required or why the existing findings adequately address such impacts, LUBA will remand for the city to provide that explanation. Bauer v. City of Portland, 44 Or LUBA 210 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A city council decision approving a subdivision with modifications for required road access must be remanded where it is unclear which documents if any the city council adopted as part of its decision, and the city council decision includes no findings explaining the modification, or reducing the required road access to a condition of approval. Petitioner's appeal is sufficient to allege prejudice to petitioner's substantial rights. Shaffer v. City of Happy Valley, 44 Or LUBA 536 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. City findings that specifically respond to a petitioner's interpretational challenge and address the only comprehensive plan goal that petitioner cites in support of that interpretational challenge are adequate to overcome petitioner's challenge that the city's findings are inadequate. Dimone v. City of Hillsboro, 44 Or LUBA 698 (2003).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A county's findings regarding the infeasibility of locating a radio transmission tower on either of two city-owned lots are adequate where the findings parallel an earlier memorandum in the record regarding one of the tax lots, and that earlier memorandum addresses the infeasibility of the other tax lot, notwithstanding the county's failure to recite specific aspects of the memorandum addressing the second tax lot. Van Nalts v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 497 (2002).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A city decision concluding that applying local sign ordinance criteria to deny a sign permit would violate Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution is inadequate, where the findings do not identify what aspects of the local sign ordinance the city believes would be found to be unconstitutional or explain why the city believes it would be unconstitutional to apply the sign ordinance. Haug v. City of Newberg, 42 Or LUBA 411 (2002).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where an application for city approval of a sign that is larger than allowed by city sign standards does not meet the city's criteria for approval of such larger signs, a city may not cite constitutional concerns and approve the request for a larger sign without (1) adopting a reviewable decision that explains what constitutional provisions the city believes would be violated and why, and (2) explaining why the appropriate remedy in that circumstance would not be to deny the request until constitutional provisions for allowing such larger signs are adopted. Haug v. City of Newberg, 42 Or LUBA 411 (2002).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a city zoning ordinance permits consideration of consolidated applications and it is not apparent that an independent process is available to consider related permits, and petitioners raised the issue of compliance with standards required for the related permits during the pendency of a conditional use application, the city erred by failing to address petitioners' argument that the related permit standards must be satisfied before the conditional use permit could be approved. Monogios and Co. v. City of Pendleton, 42 Or LUBA 291 (2002).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a permit approval criterion requires that certain driveway improvements be made to ensure emergency vehicle access, it is error to simply approve the permit conditioned on future construction of the required driveway improvements, where there is focused testimony during the permit evidentiary hearing that the easement the permit applicant intended to rely on would not permit the required improvements. The permit findings must address the testimony and explain why it is reasonable to assume the required improvements can be made. Harshman v. Jackson County, 41 Or LUBA 330 (2002).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Although local governments are required to address legitimate issues that are raised in a quasi-judicial land use proceeding concerning relevant approval criteria, local governments are not required to address in their findings every conflict in the evidence or every criticism that is made of particular evidence. Knight v. City of Eugene, 41 Or LUBA 279 (2002).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where detailed arguments are presented in the petition for review questioning the need for an additional parking lot to supply adequate parking and the challenged decision treats the need for the additional parking as a relevant issue, but the respondent's brief does not respond to that issue, a remand is required. Boly v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 537 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where comprehensive plan policies require efforts to reduce automobile use and encourage mass transit use, and arguments are presented that approving an additional parking lot adjacent to a light rail station is inconsistent with those policies, the city's unexplained dismissal of the issue requires remand. Boly v. City of Portland, 40 Or LUBA 537 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings that other resource lands that are potential candidates for inclusion in the UGB are better or more productive resource lands than the subject property, and therefore the environmental, social, energy, and economic (ESEE) consequences of urbanizing other resource lands would be more adverse than urbanizing the subject property, are adequate for purposes of OAR 660-004-0010(1)(c)(B)(iii). Such findings need not specifically identify and discuss each ESEE consequence with respect to each alternative site, absent issues raised below that would require more detailed discussion. Alliance for Responsible Land Use v. Deschutes Cty., 40 Or LUBA 304 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In evaluating reasonable alternatives to siting a utility facility necessary for public service in an EFU zone, a county must consider alternative sites identified by opponents that appear to satisfy an applicant's siting requirements and are not located on EFU-zoned land. Jordan v. Douglas County, 40 Or LUBA 192 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Reasonable alternatives to siting a utility facility necessary for public service in an EFU zone do not include non-EFU sites that the owner will not sell or lease to the utility provider. Jordan v. Douglas County, 40 Or LUBA 192 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In addressing an "adequate public facilities" zone change criterion, a county is not required to adopt findings specifically addressing every use allowed in the proposed commercial zone; more general findings may suffice. Where no party raises any issue concerning potential uses that may place more stringent demands on public facilities than the proposed use, the county may limit its consideration to the proposed use. Swyter v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 166 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A city's failure to respond to issues raised below regarding whether the "street frontage" of a flag lot is the same as its "front building line" provides no basis for remand, where it is clear under the city's land division ordinance that "street frontage" and "front building line" are not the same. Webb v. City of Bandon, 39 Or LUBA 584 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a city adopts findings addressing issues raised by petitioner during local proceedings, petitioner presents no basis for reversal or remand by repeating those issues at LUBA without challenging the findings the city adopted to address those issues. Adams v. City of Medford, 39 Or LUBA 464 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a county's findings simply state that conditions are being imposed to address identified environmental impacts from a proposed aggregate extraction site that must be addressed under local approval criteria, but the conditions that are imposed have nothing to do with the cited environmental concerns, the decision must be remanded to the county. Donnell v. Union County, 39 Or LUBA 419 (2001).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Remand is necessary for a city to address a criterion requiring the existence of a "specific geographic justification" to site a memorial within a public park, where the city's findings do not identify a geographic justification or explain why no such justification is needed. Carlsen v. City of Portland, 39 Or LUBA 93 (2000).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Conditions imposed on a proposed motocross race track and off-road vehicle park that noise from the park must comply with DEQ standards and not exceed 99 decibels are inadequate to support a finding of compliance with the noninterference standard, where the county does not determine whether compliance with DEQ standards will prevent identified impacts on surrounding farm and forest practices, and the only mechanism for achieving compliance is to limit the noise from individual vehicles to 99 decibels. Without addressing the cumulative noise impacts of multiple vehicles, the county is no position to conclude that identified impacts will not occur. Utsey v. Coos County, 38 Or LUBA 516 (2000).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a petitioner challenges a variance decision and asserts that he raised relevant issues below, the challenged decision does not include findings addressing those issues and no party appears to dispute that petitioner raised the issues, LUBA will remand the challenged decision. Bates v. City of Cascade Locks, 38 Or LUBA 349 (2000).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Although a decision maker is required to adopt findings that respond to relevant issues that are raised in quasi-judicial land use hearings, the decision maker is not necessarily required to adopt findings addressing particular items of evidence, provided LUBA is able to conclude that a reasonable decision maker could reach the disputed decision based on all the evidence. Schwerdt v. City of Corvallis, 38 Or LUBA 174 (2000).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local code criterion that requires a county to consider comments and recommendations of adjacent and vicinity property owners does not require that the county adopt findings that address every comment or recommendation. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where an issue was raised below concerning whether a proposed bed and breakfast facility violated a plan policy regulating commercial development and is not addressed in a hearings officer's decision and the policy itself and related plan and land use regulation provisions are unclear whether the policy applies, LUBA will remand the decision. Hatfield v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 664 (2000).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where no issue is raised during local proceedings concerning whether a need to save significant trees on a site would reduce the number of houses that can be constructed on a site, the city was not required to adopt findings addressing that question. Absent some reason to suspect the trees presented a development constraint, the city's decision to rely on assumptions concerning development potential of the site that do not take the trees into account is supported by substantial evidence. Neighbors for Livability v. City of Beaverton, 37 Or LUBA 408 (1999).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings that rely on the testimony of a wildlife biologist to determine that proposed mitigation measures result in a development that will not seriously interfere with fish and wildlife habitat are adequate to address petitioners' concern about the impact of the proposed development on wildlife habitat. Plotkin v. Washington County, 36 Or LUBA 378 (1999).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A decision that is not responsive to the inquiry required by applicable zoning ordinances, and does not respond to relevant issues raised during local proceedings pursuant to such ordinances, fails to provide adequate findings. Wood v. Crook County, 36 Or LUBA 143 (1999).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the applicant for a planned unit development proposes to use an area to satisfy both open space and water quality facility requirements, and petitioner and a staff report raise concerns below that the proposed open space fails to comply with approval standards because it is unusable for any purpose other than for drainage, the county must adopt findings addressing that issue. Hard Rock Enterprises v. Washington County, 36 Or LUBA 106 (1999).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where subdivision approval criteria do not require that the city determine whether a particular access route would be the "primary" access route, the city's failure to adopt such a finding and a lack of substantial evidence that the particular access route would be the primary access route provides no basis for reversal or remand. Hunt v. City of Ashland, 35 Or LUBA 467 (1999).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A county's finding of compliance with a standard requiring that a nonforest dwelling not interfere with forest practices is inadequate, where the county merely finds that the proposed dwelling presents no greater risk of fire than posed by existing residential development, and fails to address evidence that the cumulative risk of fire from the proposed dwelling and existing development will require the owner of an adjacent forestry operation to change forestry practices and incur additional costs. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where specific issues are raised concerning compliance with an approval criterion, the findings supporting the decision must respond to those issues. Rouse v. Tillamook County, 34 Or LUBA 530 (1998).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A decision amending a comprehensive plan must specifically identify the applicable statewide planning goals and include findings that substantively address how the proposed comprehensive plan amendment assures compliance with those goals. It is insufficient to make passing reference to the general subject matter of the goals in addressing other approval criteria. Larvik v. City of La Grande, 34 Or LUBA 467 (1998).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where there is no requirement to determine whether property is surplus for purposes of rezoning, a local government does not violate any procedural rights by not considering the surplus status of the property in its decision to rezone the property. St. Johns Neighborhood v. City of Portland, 34 Or LUBA 46 (1998).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where an issue is raised below whether a condition imposed in a prior land use decision supplies an applicable approval standard in subsequent land use decisions, the local government must determine whether the condition is an applicable criterion for approval and, if so, whether it is satisfied. Bradbury v. City of Bandon, 33 Or LUBA 664 (1997).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where visual impact, noise and safety issues are relevant to compliance with applicable standards and are raised by petitioner below, the local government must adequately address those issues, and conclusory findings unsupported by substantial evidence are inadequate. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 33 Or LUBA 613 (1997).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. There is no legal requirement that a local government address in its findings conflicting evidence upon which it chooses not to rely. Where a petitioner presents conflicting evidence to the city during a local appeal, but does not raise new issues, the city may rely on findings prepared prior to the local appeal. Tandem Development Corp. v. City of Hillsboro, 33 Or LUBA 335 (1997).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the city makes a determination that it is feasible to comply with a local code standard requiring that each lot in a proposed subdivision be buildable, it may defer addressing engineering details to a later date. Brown v. City of Ontario, 33 Or LUBA 180 (1997).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. ORS 215.416(9) does not require the county's findings to respond to each of the arguments raised by petitioners or to discuss each of the facts that petitioners would choose the decision to rely on. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 32 Or LUBA 56 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In approving a conditional use permit for a nonfarm dwelling, the county must make findings required by ORS 215.284(2)(c) or 215.284(3)(c) regarding the legal creation of the subject property as a separate parcel. O'Brien v. Lincoln County, 31 Or LUBA 262 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Law of the case only applies where an issue has been resolved in an earlier appeal. The county cannot rely on petitioners' failure to assign error under Goal 3 in a previous appeal to conclude that LUBA has made a de facto determination that the county's findings establish compliance with its own agricultural lands goal. Brown v. Coos County, 31 Or LUBA 142 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In the absence of adequate findings, LUBA may affirm a local government's conclusion that a particular criterion is satisfied when facts in the record clearly support the conclusion. However, when there are no findings of compliance with a particular criterion, which was identified as applicable by the local staff and raised as an issue during the local proceedings, LUBA will not consider whether disputed facts could support findings of compliance. DLCD v. Clatsop County, 31 Or LUBA 90 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. The county's failure to address in findings the issues raised by a state agency not only shows a failure to cooperate as required by the county's plan, but also violates the general rule that when a relevant issue is raised in the local proceedings, it must be addressed in findings. Furler v. Curry County, 31 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. LUBA need not determine whether each one of the county's findings independently could satisfy the rough proportionality test established in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). Rather, LUBA need only determine whether cumulatively the county's findings establish that there is a sufficient connection between the impacts of the proposed development and the dedication and frontage road improvements the county is requiring. Art Piculell Group v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 381 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government's design review approval for a proposed apartment complex must be remanded where it does not contain findings that address relevant approval standards relating to open space and recreation, and does not address issues raised in the proceedings below that are relevant to compliance with those standards. Winkler v. City of Cottage Grove, 30 Or LUBA 351 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. The county is not required to address all conflicting evidence in its findings, but the findings must address and respond to specific issues raised in the local proceedings that are relevant to compliance with approval standards. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a local decision approving a replacement dwelling does not make specific findings regarding the applicability of a local ordinance establishing a legal access requirement, and does not indicate whether legal access is a mandatory approval standard, the decision must be remanded for appropriate findings. Drake v. Polk County, 30 Or LUBA 199 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When LUBA's remand order requires the county to address one code provision, the fact that certain issues raised under that code provision are also addressed by another code provision does not broaden the scope of the remand order to include the latter. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 30 Or LUBA 135 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the city's findings of compliance with an ambiguous provision are inadequate and unresponsive to the issues raised by petitioners, on remand the city must specifically respond to those issues and explain its conclusions. Canby Quality of Life Committee v. City of Canby, 30 Or LUBA 166 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government is not required to make findings to address criteria that it has found to be inapplicable. East Lancaster Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Salem, 30 Or LUBA 147 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When a local ordinance requires a determination that its specific requirements can be satisfied by the imposition of conditions, the city must make findings, supported by substantial evidence, with respect to feasibility. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When specific issues relevant to compliance with applicable approval standards are raised in the proceedings before the county, the county's findings must address and respond specifically to those issues. Collier v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 462 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. The county's denial of a developed exception will be upheld when the county finds that the physical characteristics of the property do not render it irrevocably committed to nonresource uses; there is continuing resource use of properties to the north, east and west; and the existence of public facilities and services installed to serve the residence on the site do not irrevocably commit the remainder of the site to nonresource uses. Sandgren v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 454 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government decision granting site plan approval for off-street parking use of property containing an existing dwelling must address issues raised by petitioners concerning whether the approved site plan results in violations of code yard and setback requirements for the existing dwelling. Jackman v. City of Tillamook, 29 Or LUBA 391 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Failure of local government findings to address a specific issue raised by a party below, which is relevant to compliance with applicable approval standards, is a basis for remand. Moore v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 372 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where, during a local government proceeding regarding the existence of a nonconforming use, specific issues were raised concerning whether a complete or partial interruption or abandonment of any nonconforming use of the subject property had occurred, findings that simply state use of the property has not been interrupted or abandoned are impermissibly conclusory. Suydam v. Deschutes County, 29 Or LUBA 273 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. If relevant issues concerning compliance with applicable permit standards were specifically raised in the local government proceedings, they must be addressed in the local government's findings. Skrepetos v. Jackson County, 29 Or LUBA 193 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where petitioner seeks remand because the challenged decision fails to include findings on specific relevant issues raised in testimony below, petitioner must explain why the cited testimony is relevant to an applicable approval standard. ONRC v. City of Oregon City, 29 Or LUBA 90 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the local code requires a determination that the proposal be in harmony with the natural environment in the area, and there is no dispute that native plant communities are a relevant characteristic of the natural environment, the decision must include findings determining the proposal is in harmony with the native plant communities in the natural environment. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the local code requires a determination that the proposal have minimal adverse impacts on the surrounding area, and the subject property is located within a wild and scenic river corridor, the decision must include findings evaluating the proposal's impacts on the wild and scenic river corridor. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Past use of property adjacent to the subject property as part of a nonconforming use would not establish a right to continue, on the subject property, the part of the nonconforming use that was located on other property. Where such issue is raised during local proceedings to determine the nature and extent of the nonconforming use of the subject property, it must be addressed in the local government's findings. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 417 (1994).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where a local government is required under its code to determine whether 10 percent of the "total project value" has been expended for construction, and parties raise relevant issues before the local government concerning what should be included in determining "total project value," the local government must address those issues in its findings. McKenzie v. Multnomah County, 27 Or LUBA 523 (1994).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government's findings supporting its decision on a conditional use application must address specific issues that were raised during the local proceedings and are relevant to compliance with applicable approval standards. Bottum v. Union County, 26 Or LUBA 407 (1994).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Failure to determine the cumulative impacts of a proposal provides no basis for reversal or remand of a decision unless petitioner establishes that some legal standard requires a determination of cumulative impacts. City of Barlow v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. In the absence of a legal requirement that a local government determine an applicant's intent with regard to a development proposal, a local government has no obligation to determine such intent or to examine an applicant's prior history of compliance with land use or other regulations. City of Barlow v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 375 (1994).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings must address and respond to specific issues relevant to compliance with applicable approval standards that were raised in the proceedings below. Testa v. Clackamas County, 26 Or LUBA 357 (1994).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A local government's findings on the reasons justifying a goal exception under ORS 197.732(1)(c)(A) and OAR 660-04-022(1)(a) must respond to issues specifically raised by petitioners below concerning possible means of lessening or eliminating the need for the proposed use. Pacific Rivers Council, Inc. v. Lane County, 26 Or LUBA 323 (1993).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where petitioners raised an issue below concerning whether a particular code provision is an applicable approval standard, and the challenged decision contains no interpretation explaining that code provision is either inapplicable or satisfied, LUBA must remand the challenged decision. Hixson v. Josephine County, 26 Or LUBA 159 (1993).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where petitioners fail to identify any applicable standard arguably limiting the validity of a local government's initial PUD development plan approval to a particular period of time, the local government's failure to address the issue of whether the PUD development plan expired does not provide a basis for reversal or remand. Gage v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 449 (1993).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where the challenged decision acknowledges arguments below that emergency vehicles may have difficulty accessing a site proposed for urban level residential development, the challenged decision must explain how the proposal complies with Goal 11 in view of that acknowledged difficulty. Neuharth v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 267 (1993).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. When a party raises a relevant issue below concerning whether a perceived surplus of classroom seats is in fact not a surplus due to the effects of already approved development, the local government must address that issue in its findings. Burghardt v. City of Molalla, 25 Or LUBA 43 (1993).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Where an applicable code criterion requires that an existing structure have been issued all necessary permits in the past and a party raises a substantial issue concerning whether such is the case, the local government is required to adopt findings explaining why the code criterion is met and those findings must be supported by substantial evidence. Mercer v. Josephine County, 23 Or LUBA 608 (1992).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. A general plan policy concerning transportation safety does not require that findings supporting a legislative comprehensive plan transportation map amendment negate every potential safety problem that might result from future implementation of the improvements authorized by the plan amendment. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 23 Or LUBA 565 (1992).

1.4.6 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Issues Addressed. Findings must address and respond to specific issues relevant to compliance with applicable approval standards that were raised in the proceedings below. Heiller v. Josephine County, 23 Or LUBA 551 (1992).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Where an applicant proposes a planned development, and where a local code provision requires the local government to "seek to determine that the development * * * will not create a drainage or pollution problem outside the planned area," the local government errs by not adopting findings determining whether the construction of a road extension that is proposed as part of and that would provide access to the planned development will create a drainage or pollution problem outside the planned area. Lundeen v. City of Waldport, 80 Or LUBA 450 (2019).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Relying upon a local government staff report's citation to local code provisions is insufficient to "raise" an "issue" for purposes of bringing an appeal before LUBA under those code provisions pursuant to ORS 197.763(1) and 197.835(3) because no party to the proceedings below would understand from the staff report that an "issue" had been "raise[d]" regarding compliance with those code provisions. McAndrew v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 21 (2018).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Where a local code provision requires that a proposed development project not "seriously interfere" with the preservation of "fish and wildlife areas and habitat" as identified under the county's comprehensive plan, a hearings officer does not err in applying the code provision only to that portion of the property that is designated as "fish and wildlife areas and habitat." McAndrew v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 21 (2018).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. There is no general requirement that a city council discuss the evidence it chooses not to rely on and a city council's failure to discuss opposing evidence does not necessarily mean the city council did not consider that opposing evidence. Evans v. City of Bandon, 74 Or LUBA 418 (2016).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Goal 16, Implementation Requirement 1 requires evaluation of the impacts of development allowed under proposed zoning, but does not require the local government to evaluate potential adverse impacts of alterations approved in earlier land use decisions. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Where a local code provides that "Significant Natural Areas" are a subset of "Significant Natural Resources," a hearings officer does not err in failing to find that a proposed subdivision complies with a local code section that only applies to "Significant Natural Areas," absent a demonstration that the area in question is not only a "Significant Natural Resource," but also a "Significant Natural Area." Carver v. Washington County, 70 Or LUBA 23 (2014).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Findings supporting a legislative decision that amends the Oregon Highway Plan to provide a process for modifying mobility standards need not address issues raised below regarding whether future decisions approving higher mobility standards will cause increased congestion of specific transportation facilities and increase pollution contrary to Goal 6, where Goal 6 will apply directly to any future decisions approving higher mobility standards for specific transportation facilities, and such issues cannot be meaningfully addressed in a legislative decision adopting general amendments to the Oregon Highway Plan. Setniker v. ODOT, 66 Or LUBA 54 (2012).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. When an approval criterion requires that the property for which a variance is sought must have circumstances that do not apply to "other properties in the same vicinity or land use district," the findings must address whether the circumstances which allegedly support a variance exist on other properties in the same vicinity or land use district. Butte Conservancy v. City of Gresham, 51 Or LUBA 194 (2006).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. In granting design approval for a highway interchange improvement project originally proposed as part of a larger project, a decision maker is not required to study and address interim impacts to existing facilities covered by the larger project other than the interchange, and the decision maker's failure to do so does not leave the evidence supporting approval of the interchange project something other than substantial evidence. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Findings adequate to demonstrate that an urban renewal plan "conforms to the comprehensive plan as a whole" pursuant to ORS 457.095(3) must at least (1) set forth the applicable comprehensive plan provisions and (2) express the local government's judgment as to the relationship between the renewal plan and the pertinent plan provisions. While the phrase "as a whole" in ORS 457.095(3) may allow the local government to balance competing plan policies, it does not allow the local government to address only some policies it identifies as being applicable and, without explanation, fail to address others also identified as applicable. Zimmerman v. Columbia County, 40 Or LUBA 483 (2001).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Until the county has adopted findings that determine precisely what inventoried Goal 5 resource areas are located on the subject property, it is not possible to identify which county Goal 5 resource protection programs affect all or parts of the subject property, and the county is in no position to adopt findings explaining whether a committed-exception zone-change is consistent with the county's existing Goal 5 resource protection provisions. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Findings addressing lands available for rural residential development need not consider residential land within urban growth boundaries. Land within urban growth boundaries is not rural land. Turrell v. Harney County, 36 Or LUBA 244 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. An assignment of error challenging the adequacy of findings that an approval criterion is met must be denied, where the decision maker also adopts alternative findings that the approval criterion does not apply to the challenged permit application and those alternative findings are not challenged. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 68 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. OAR 660-004-0028 does not require a finding that the characteristics of the proposed exception area are sufficient in and of themselves to commit the property to nonresource use. All factors in the rule must be considered, including the characteristics of the adjacent lands. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. In considering challenges to committed exception findings the question of whether the local government adopted the required findings addressing the characteristics of adjacent lands and the relationship between the exception area and adjacent lands is distinct from the question of whether the adopted findings demonstrate that uses allowed by Goal 3 are impracticable on the subject property. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Under OAR 660-004-0028(6)(c)(A), conflicts with rural residential development in exception areas created pursuant to applicable goals cannot be used to justify a committed exception on the subject property. A finding that a majority of nearby parcels were created before the statewide planning goals is insufficient to demonstrate compliance with this requirement. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. The requirement in OAR 660-004-0028(6)(c)(B) that "several contiguous undeveloped parcels" under one ownership shall be considered as one farm or forest operation does not require that a contiguous developed parcel be considered as part of contiguous farm operation. Lovinger v. Lane County, 36 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. A local provision requiring compatibility between a proposed use and development of abutting properties by outright permitted uses does not require an exhaustive listing and discussion of every subcategory of use permitted in the area. A county's general description of permitted uses and explanation why the proposed use is compatible with types of permitted uses is adequate. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. A specific finding of feasibility regarding an approval criterion is not satisfied by a general finding of overall feasibility, where a number of problems and conflicts were identified during the local proceedings concerning the particular approval criterion. Tenly Properties Corp. v. Washington County, 34 Or LUBA 352 (1998).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Where a decision does not describe land uses on any of the tax lots in the study area, how many lots are used for farm, forest or other uses, what those uses are, or how extensive those uses are, the decision does not supply enough information to draw a "clear picture" of the land use pattern in the area. Hearne v. Baker County, 34 Or LUBA 176 (1998).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Lot and parcel sizes are not dispositive of, or even particularly relevant to, determining the land use pattern. Even less relevant are tax lot sizes, which are less likely than lots and parcels to correspond to land ownership and land uses. Hearne v. Baker County, 34 Or LUBA 176 (1998).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Plan map and zoning amendments that significantly affect a transportation facility must be consistent with the Transportation Planning Rule (TPR). Therefore findings must address Goal 12 and the TPR as they apply to all access to the subject property unless the local government restricts access by imposing conditions of approval. Sanders v. Yamhill County, 34 Or LUBA 69 (1998).

1.4.7 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Scope. Where the only use approved by the challenged decision is mineral and aggregate extraction on a 186-acre site, and no uses on the remainder of intervenor's 490-acre parcel are subject to review under ORS 215.296, the county's findings correctly limit the evaluation of compliance with ORS 215.296 to the 186-acre area of mineral and aggregate extraction. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 32 Or LUBA 56 (1996).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where comprehensive plan and local code provisions provide that the comprehensive plan may be amended only when "[t]here is a demonstrated public need for the change," the governing body may rely on a 12-acre deficit of High Density Residential (HDR) land identified in its acknowledged Buildable Lands Inventory (BLI) to conclude that that there is a "public need" to approve an application to redesignate six acres of land to HDR, even where, subsequent to the adoption and acknowledgment of its BLI, the governing body has approved applications to rezone other lands, totaling 92 acres, to HDR. Carson Property LUBA Appeal, Inc. v. City of Corvallis, 81 Or LUBA 175 (2020).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where on remand a city accepts new evidence and adopts new findings regarding a planned unit development (PUD) approval standard, the issue of whether the new findings conflict with re-adopted but unchanged findings addressing other standards was not, and could not have been, resolved in the appeal of the city's initial PUD approval, and thus the "law of the case" principle under Beck v. City of Tillamook, 313 Or 148, 831 P2d 678 (1992), does not preclude a petitioner from raising that issue on appeal of the remand decision. Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Findings that a 20-foot paved width is necessary to provide a "safe and adequate" transportation system for purposes of one planned unit development (PUD) standard do not conflict with findings addressing a differently worded standard that a 14-foot paved width is sufficient to ensure that the PUD is not an "impediment to emergency response." Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. In applying a vacation rental dwelling (VRD) standard that prohibits a VRD that would alter the character of the surrounding area so as to substantially limit permitted uses in the zoning district, the size of the residence, in and of itself, is largely irrelevant where a house of any size is permitted outright in the zone so long as it is occupied by the owner or leased on a long-term basis. Remand is required where the findings denying the VRD focus almost exclusively on the size of the dwelling rather than the proposed VRD use. Gu v. City of Bandon, 77 Or LUBA 535 (2018).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where the hearings officer adopts a board of commissioners' interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy that was articulated in a different decision, and that interpretation is not challenged on appeal, LUBA will reject a challenge to the adequacy of the hearings officer's findings, arguing that the findings fail to resolve all potential inconsistencies or ambiguities in applying the commissioners' interpretation to the proposed rezoning at issue, where the findings adequately explain the hearings officer's understanding of the plan policy, as interpreted by the commissioners, and adequately explain how the policy is applied to the rezoning application before the hearings officer. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 75 Or LUBA 302 (2017).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a hearings officer's finding takes inconsistent positions regarding the nature of the legal issue to be resolved in proceedings following a LUBA remand of a permit approval for a destination resort, a second remand is required. Central Land and Cattle Company, LLC v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 326 (2016).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a decision includes potentially conflicting findings that (1) all of a geologist's recommendations must be implemented or (2) only those recommendations identified by staff must be implemented, but the first finding can be harmonized with the second because the first finding does not expressly require that all of the geologist's recommendations must be implemented, it is appropriate to interpret the first finding to only require implementation of the staff identified recommendations. Pennock v. City of Bandon, 72 Or LUBA 379 (2015).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a local government adopts alternative findings to address disjunctive statutory requirements for annexation, any inconsistency between the alternative findings is not a basis for remand. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 71 Or LUBA 14 (2015).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. A city's findings in support of its decision to deny permit approval must adequately interpret and apply the criteria the city relies on to deny the application in a way that is consistent with the language of the criteria and must provide a coherent explanation for why the city believes the proposal does not comply with the criteria. A city decision will be remanded where its findings do not comply with these minimum requirements for adequate findings. Caster v. City of Silverton, 54 Or LUBA 441 (2007).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where an approval criterion requires a finding that the proposed land use "will be compatible with existing or anticipated uses in terms of size, building scale and style, intensity, setbacks, and landscaping," the local government must identify "existing or anticipated uses," describe those uses in the terms specified, describe the proposed land use in the terms specified, and then perform the required comparison to determine if the proposed land use and existing or anticipated uses will be compatible. Where a city's decision does none of those things, the decision will be remanded. Caster v. City of Silverton, 54 Or LUBA 441 (2007).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. An inconsistency regarding operating hours between the governing body's decision and a finding in the planning commission decision incorporated by reference into the governing body's decision does not warrant remand, where it is reasonably clear that the governing body intended to reverse the planning commission decision with respect to operating hours and inadvertently incorporated the planning commission finding. O'Rourke v. Union County, 54 Or LUBA 614 (2007).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where planning staff prepare a final written decision based on an oral decision by the governing body, the far better practice is to have the governing body review and approve the final written decision prior to its issuance, rather than have staff sign and issue the written decision, to avoid potential inconsistencies between the oral decision and the final written decision. O'Rourke v. Union County, 54 Or LUBA 614 (2007).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where the record reflects that 10 acres of irrigation rights were removed from two 20-acre parcels because (1) irrigating with that water was extremely inefficient, (2) the nonfarm parcels consist of 85 percent bare ground, and (3) moving the irrigation rights back would provide no benefit, county's findings that returning irrigation rights to the property would not render the nonfarm parcels generally suitable for the production of farm crops or livestock is supported by substantial evidence. Peterson v. Crook County, 52 Or LUBA 160 (2006).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. That findings a local government adopts in support of its decision may conflict with some findings in a planning staff report that the city council adopts by reference provides no basis for remand where petitioner identifies no conflicting findings that warrant remand. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 50 Or LUBA 226 (2005).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where the approved tentative plat does not propose curbs on a private street, but the hearings officer's findings suggest that curbs will be provided to direct storm water to catch basins and there is expert testimony that curbs are necessary to direct storm water to catch basins, remand is necessary to address whether the decision requires curbs and, if not, how storm water will be directed to catch basins. Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Even if intersection improvements that are required in approving a destination resort will maintain acceptable levels of service on nearby roads and key intersections, it does not necessarily follow that there will not be conflicts between the increased levels of traffic the proposed destination resort will generate on these roads and agricultural traffic (including livestock and large slow-moving agricultural vehicles) seeking to negotiate these same roads. However, where the relevant approval standard only requires "reasonable compatibility," and the testimony on both sides of the seriousness of the conflicts from such traffic is speculative, LUBA cannot say the county was unreasonable in finding the destination resort will be "reasonably compatible" with nearby farm use and farm traffic. Burke v. Crook County, 48 Or LUBA 23 (2004).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. A local government could reasonably extrapolate from the fact that migratory birds using an existing wetland are not bothered by an adjoining aggregate mine operation to find that additional migratory birds attracted to the wetland, when enhanced, also would not be bothered by the mine operation. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. A decision to deny a dwelling based on an applicant's failure to demonstrate that the dwelling has only "minimum impact" on wildlife habitat is inadequate, where the hearings officer also found that the dwelling complies with big game habitat criteria and that such compliance establishes a presumption that the dwelling has only minimum impact on habitat, and the hearings officer does not explain those apparently inconsistent findings. McAlister v. Jackson County, 47 Or LUBA 125 (2004).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. A county's finding that proposed mining activities are not minimized sufficiently to avoid conflicts with identified riparian resources is not adequate, where the riparian area is located near water courses that will receive water diverted from mining cells and the county adopted other findings that mining will not affect identified wetlands that are located between the riparian area and presumably would be more susceptible to fluctuations in water levels than the riparian areas. Eugene Sand and Gravel, Inc. v. Lane County, 44 Or LUBA 50 (2003).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. There is no inconsistency in a city council subdivision approval decision that (1) refuses to delay approval or require setbacks for a possible future freeway, (2) requires elimination of a proposed subdivision access to the existing roadway that might be displaced by the possible future freeway, and (3) eliminates a planning commission requirement for pedestrian access to the roadway that might be displaced by the possible future freeway where (a) the possible future freeway is not yet included in the city's comprehensive plan, (b) the decision to eliminate the proposed roadway connection is based on an Oregon Department of Transportation policy that would preclude approval of the roadway connection, and (c) a code provision excuses pedestrian connections where they are found to be "infeasible or inappropriate" and the city council adopts an unchallenged finding that the pedestrian connection is "not necessary." Baida v. City of Medford, 44 Or LUBA 473 (2003).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. City findings that conclude that proposed park facility development within a floodway complies with a comprehensive plan policy regarding community parks are inadequate where those findings interpret the community park policy as being both aspirational and mandatory and the city's findings provide no explanation for that apparent discrepancy. Monogios v. City of Pendleton, 44 Or LUBA 576 (2003).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where the staff report that the county governing body adopts as findings recommends a 300-yard buffer to ensure a hunting preserve will be compatible with adjoining properties and the county governing body approves the hunting preserve without a buffer, but adopts no additional findings explaining why no buffer is needed to ensure compatibility, the county governing body's decision must be remanded. Underhill v. Wasco County, 43 Or LUBA 277 (2002).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. LUBA will remand a city decision denying a zone change where the city adopts as findings both a staff report that recommends and provides the rationale for denying the zone change, and an earlier staff report that recommends and provides the rationale for approving the zone change. Larmer Warehouse v. City of Salem, 43 Or LUBA 53 (2002).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. A finding that a proposed parking layout may be relocated to expand the septic drainfield does not conflict with a condition requiring that parking shall be provided as shown in the site plan, where it is clear that the purpose of the condition is to satisfy a standard addressing the number of parking spaces, and not the location of the parking lot. Baker v. Lane County, 43 Or LUBA 493 (2003).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Absent a criterion requiring that the city consider the height of an existing church in approving the height of a proposed addition to that church, the height of the existing structure has no bearing on the city's decision. That the city calculated the height of the proposed addition based in part on the grade elevation of the existing structure does not compel the city to consider the height of the existing structure in approving the proposed addition. Sattler v. City of Beaverton, 41 Or LUBA 106 (2001).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where the county's code requires that streets providing access to a proposed land division be improved to a specified width and composition if the streets (1) will serve four or more lots or parcels and (2) are likely to serve additional lots or parcels in the future, LUBA will remand a decision when the county appears to answer those questions in the affirmative by requiring compliance with the width standard, but does not require compliance with the composition standard, and does not explain the reason for the apparent inconsistency. Dudek v. Umatilla County, 40 Or LUBA 416 (2001).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. It is not inconsistent for findings to reject alternative sites under OAR 660-004-0010(1)(c)(B)(ii) because proposed industrial uses would conflict with surrounding high-density residential uses, while concluding under OAR 660-004-0010(1)(c)(B)(iv) that, as limited by conditions of approval, industrial use of the subject property is compatible with rural residential uses that border the subject property on one side. Alliance for Responsible Land Use v. Deschutes Cty., 40 Or LUBA 304 (2001).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. The practice of incorporating other decisions or documents into the challenged decision as findings increases the risk of adopting inconsistent findings. However, such inconsistent findings do not provide a basis for remand when the local government explains and resolves the discrepancy between any conflicting decisions or documents it incorporates in its findings. Spiro v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 133 (2000).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a zoning ordinance standard requires consideration of residential appearance and function of an "area" in approving a bed and breakfast facility, and a hearings officer's findings use different areas in applying that criterion so that the analysis is internally inconsistent, the findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with the standard. Hatfield v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 664 (2000).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a zoning ordinance standard requires that the transportation system be capable of serving the proposed and existing uses and the findings addressing that standard focus exclusively on the relatively small traffic generating impact of the proposal without ever addressing the adequacy of the transportation system, the findings are inadequate to demonstrate compliance with the standard. Hatfield v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 664 (2000).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Findings that dwellings can be built consistent with building setbacks are not responsive to a criterion that requires that the site be "suitable for the proposed use considering size, shape, location, topography and location of improvements and natural features." Robinson v. City of Silverton, 37 Or LUBA 521 (2000).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a hearings officer's findings incorporate staff report findings that are inconsistent concerning one issue, LUBA will not remand the hearings officer's decision where it is clear that the hearings officer's findings superseded the staff report on that issue. Central Bethany Dev. Co. v. Washington County, 33 Or LUBA 463 (1997).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. In determining whether a UGB amendment is justified on the basis of housing need, a local government cannot focus its needs analysis on the needs of the existing population if the proposed development is intended for a different population. Concerned Citizens v. Jackson County, 33 Or LUBA 70 (1997).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. If a city seeking to expand its UGB wishes to recognize a housing need for a population other than the existing population, it must amend its population projections to recognize both the natural growth of the existing population and the addition of a new population group, and must describe the proposed development with enough specificity that it is reasonably clear the UGB amendment will accomplish the desired objective. Concerned Citizens v. Jackson County, 33 Or LUBA 70 (1997).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. If local government findings addressing different approval standards conflict with each other, and this conflict is not reconciled in the challenged decision, the conflict may undermine the findings sufficiently to render them inadequate to support the local government's determinations of compliance. Doob v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 293 (1994).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. Where a challenged decision states certain findings supersede other inconsistent findings, a general challenge that findings adopted to support the decision are internally inconsistent provides no basis for reversal or remand, where petitioner fails to explain why the findings are inadequate to establish consistency with particular approval criteria or explain why alleged inconsistencies are not resolved by the designated superseding findings. Eola-Glen Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 672 (1993).

1.4.8 Administrative Law – Adequacy of Findings – Logic and Consistency. An erroneous finding that the local government cannot impose a condition of subdivision approval requiring measures to mitigate off-site traffic impacts, provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the local government adopts superseding findings explaining why it believes such measures are not warranted and the local government's authority to require such measures is permissive rather than mandatory. Eola-Glen Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 672 (1993).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a local government adopts a post-acknowledgment plan amendment creating a new zone that allows 20-acre lots, an argument that DEQ rules indicate that properties of 10 or more acres in size are generally able to support on-site wastewater systems is not sufficient to establish compliance with Goal 11 with respect to wastewater where those rules appear for the first time in the response brief, where there are no findings or evidence in the record addressing wastewater, and where there is no evidence in the record that the rule is accurate within the portion of the local government's jurisdiction at issue. Similarly, references to the proximity of the majority of candidate lands to fire districts, to evidence that more demand for funds would not be created in one of the districts, to 10 years of data indicating that less than two percent of fires resulted from residential structures, and to local fire protection standards with which future development would be required to comply are not sufficient to establish compliance with Goal 11 with respect to fire protection where there is no analysis of the likelihood of increased fire as more residences are potentially introduced into the area or discussion of the capacity of the existing fire service organizations to provide more service. DLCD v. Douglas County, 80 Or LUBA 98 (2019).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where the county approves an amendment to a planned development approval for a resort, golf course and aerial challenge course, and petitioner argues the county improperly construed the applicable provisions of the county's code, but petitioner has not ultimately challenged the board of county commissioners' interpretation, or otherwise explained why LUBA is not required to affirm that interpretation under ORS 197.829(1), petitioner has provided no basis for reversal or remand. Carkulis v. Lincoln County, 79 Or LUBA 610 (2019).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where petitioner argues the county committed a procedural error that prejudiced his substantial rights when the board of county commissioners failed to consider a written statement that petitioner submitted to the board of commissioners at the hearing, but petitioner does not establish that the board of county commissioners actually failed to consider petitioner's written statement, and petitioner failed to object to the alleged procedural error below, petitioner has not established that the county committed a procedural error or violated an applicable legal standard. Carkulis v. Lincoln County, 79 Or LUBA 610 (2019).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a hearings officer's interpretive findings in support of his conclusion that a front setback and height standard qualify as "site-related development standards" are inadequate, LUBA will nevertheless affirm the hearings officer's decision where the hearings officer's decision is (1) consistent with prior hearings officer decisions, (2) consistent with prior city council decision, (3) consistent with relevant purpose statements, and (4) consistent with the relevant legislative history. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local governing body commits no error in requesting that a prevailing party prepare written findings for it to adopt. And the governing body commits no error in adopting written findings that deviate from statements made at the final evidentiary hearing, and it is those written findings and not the oral statements that are subject to LUBA review on the merits. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Findings of fact and law are the decision; they are not evidence. A local governing body commits no error in adopting new findings following a LUBA remand for inadequate findings, without reopening the evidentiary record. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where an applicant for a historic landmark designation advances three arguments why a property owner may not refuse to consent under ORS 197.722(1) and thereby terminate consideration of the application, the historic review board errs by terminating consideration of the application without adopting findings that respond to those arguments. McLoughlin Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Oregon City, 76 Or LUBA 180 (2017).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Under OAR 661-010-0025(1)(a) a local government may clarify its understanding of all the documents a final decision maker adopted as supporting findings, by collecting all those adopted findings together at the beginning of the record. Rawson v. Hood River County, 75 Or LUBA 200 (2017).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. In amending a transportation systems plan (TSP) to locate a bypass through an industrial area, a local government is not obligated to adopt findings regarding the post-amendment adequacy of its inventory of commercial and industrial lands, where the acknowledged zoning district that applies to those lands already anticipates that at least some of those lands may be used for transportation facilities. Land Watch of Lane County v. Lane County, 74 Or LUBA 76 (2016).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a governing body adopts findings that were prepared by others, those findings become the findings of the governing body, and it does not matter who prepared or previously adopted the findings. Parkview Terrace Development LLC v. City of Grants Pass, 70 Or LUBA 37 (2014).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Even if there is no statutory or other legal requirement that a building permit must in all cases be supported by findings, the record must be sufficient for LUBA or Court of Appeals review if the building permit qualifies as a land use decision. But the initial burden in an appeal to LUBA of such a building permit is to establish an arguable legal error. Once that is done, if the record is not sufficient to establish that the local government correctly applied the law, remand may be required. Kerns Neighbors v. City of Portland, 67 Or LUBA 130 (2013).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. The absence of findings addressing whether an ordinance adopted on remand is consistent with applicable comprehensive plan policies is not a basis for reversal or remand, where the ordinance merely deletes text from the original ordinance subject to remand, on remand the county adopted findings concluding that the original ordinance is consistent with the plan policies, and the petitioner identifies nothing in the deletions accomplished by the remand ordinance that might cause the county to reach a different conclusion with respect to the remand ordinance. Hatley v. Umatilla County, 66 Or LUBA 265 (2012).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Even if there is no state or local standard that requires that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, a legislative land use decision must be supported by findings or accessible material in the record that is sufficient to show that applicable criteria were applied and any required considerations were considered. An unexplained finding that the comprehensive plan does not require that multifamily housing be located in the city's commercial zone is not sufficient to demonstrate that a zoning ordinance amendment to delete multi-family housing as a permitted use in the city's commercial zone is consistent with the city's comprehensive plan. Cassidy v. City of Glendale, 66 Or LUBA 314 (2012).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Comprehensive plan policies may be mandatory considerations, such that the local government is obligated to adopt findings addressing those considerations, even if individual policies are not mandatory approval criteria that must be independently satisfied or complied with. Heitsch v. City of Salem, 65 Or LUBA 187 (2012).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A finding that the public interest will not be prejudiced if a right-of-way is vacated is not adequate to address a comprehensive plan policy that asks whether the proposed right-of-way vacation "satisfies a compelling public need," because the finding answers a different question than the question asked by the comprehensive plan policy. Heitsch v. City of Salem, 65 Or LUBA 187 (2012).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A finding that a proposed right-of-way vacation "will not degrade * * * accessibility in the surrounding neighborhoods" is not sufficient to address a comprehensive plan policy that "[a] proposed vacation should not limit, nor make more difficult, safe and convenient pedestrian and bicycle access," where the barrier that two cemeteries currently pose for pedestrian, bicycle and vehicular traffic was the topic of considerable testimony and the vacation would eliminate the only existing publicly owned property to provide pedestrian and bicycle access through the cemeteries. Heitsch v. City of Salem, 65 Or LUBA 187 (2012).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Although there is no general legal requirement that all legislative land use decisions must be supported by findings, where the scope and meaning of at least some applicable comprehensive plan policies are unclear, it is highly unlikely that a decision to replace an existing mandatory, regulatory program to improve septic system maintenance with a voluntary, educational program to achieve the same goal will be defensible on appeal without adequate findings. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Dunes City, 65 Or LUBA 358 (2012).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. If a local government in granting planned development approval wishes to defer a finding that is required at the time of planned development approval to a subsequent, future proceeding, it must ensure that the public will be provided the same participatory rights at the future proceeding that they have at the time of planned development approval. Rosenzweig v. City of McMinnville, 64 Or LUBA 402 (2011).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. ORS 215.416(9) requires that permits and expedited land divisions be supported by adequate findings. However, other kinds of county quasi-judicial land use decisions must also be supported by adequate findings, even if ORS 215.416(9) does not apply. Mingo v. Morrow County, 63 Or LUBA 357 (2011).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A finding that a proposed solid waste disposal operation will have "no significant effect" on farm or forest uses is not sufficient to also demonstrate that the operation will have "no adverse effect." While the two standards are similar, they are not the same, and separate findings are required. Crocker v. Jefferson County, 60 Or LUBA 317 (2010).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where there is (1) a lack of evidence that the additional parking spaces that would be required under a legislative land use regulation amendment will materially increase the total number of vehicle trips, (2) some evidence that the legislative amendment will not cause trips to increase materially, and (3) petitioner does not identify which transportation facilities it believes will be significantly affected by the amendment, a local government's brief finding that the legislative amendment will not significantly affect transportation facilities is adequate. Home Builders Association v. City of Eugene, 59 Or LUBA 116 (2009).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government's legislative land use regulation amendment that increases the required number of off-street parking spaces for multiple family dwellings could impact the local government's plan to comply with OAR 660-012-0045(5)(c)(A), which requires that the local government have a parking plan which "[a]chieves a 10% reduction in the number of parking spaces per capita in the MPO." Where such a legislative land use decision is not supported by findings that address OAR 660-012-0045(5)(c)(A), the decision must be remanded. Home Builders Association v. City of Eugene, 59 Or LUBA 116 (2009).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Absent a local or specific statutory requirement that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, such decisions need not be supported by findings as long as LUBA and the appellate courts with the aid of the parties and the record can perform their review function. Friends of Umatilla County v. Umatilla County, 58 Or LUBA 12 (2008).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. With the caveat that a legislative land use decision that is not supported by findings may have to be remanded if LUBA or the appellate courts are unable to perform their review function, there is no statute, statewide planning goal or administrative rule that generally requires that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings. Port of St. Helens v. City of Scappoose, 58 Or LUBA 122 (2008).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. While respondents may supply argument and record citations in support of a local governments' legislative decision to supplement any adopted findings, respondents cannot recharacterize or change a legislative decision's stated decision-making rationale to be something that is at odds with the decision-making rationale that is expressed in the legislative decision itself. Friends of French Prairie v. Marion County, 58 Or LUBA 387 (2009).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a county engineer testifies that the applicant may need to acquire "vision easements" if necessary and the county imposes a condition of approval to that effect, the county is not required to adopt a finding that it is "feasible" for the applicant to obtain such easements from neighbors, absent some indication that there is a legal or practical impediment to obtaining the easements. Gardener v. Marion County, 56 Or LUBA 583 (2008).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where the petitioner raises a number of issues, some directed at a remanded decision that is not before the city, and others at the application that is before the city, and the city prudently adopts findings addressing all issues raised, the findings that address issues regarding an application that is not before the city are surplusage and not binding on the city or parties, and LUBA will not address challenges to those findings. Brodersen v. City of Ashland, 55 Or LUBA 350 (2007).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Provided local law does not dictate a different result, local governments generally may approve a proposed development of land after providing any required notice and hearings−without finding that the proposal complies with all relevant approval criteria−so long as the local government defers the required findings to a later stage and ensures that a second opportunity for any required notice and public hearing is provided before the required findings are adopted at that later stage. Meadow Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 55 Or LUBA 472 (2007).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. It may not be appropriate to grant conditional approval while deferring required findings to a subsequent approval stage, even where there will be a full public right to participate in the subsequent approval stage, where the initial decision has the effect of rendering the subsequent review moot or prevents meaningful review. However, where the initial decision has no legal or preclusive effect on the subsequent review, such conditional approval provides no basis for reversal or remand. Meadow Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 55 Or LUBA 472 (2007).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A county may not rely on a written statement that was prepared by one of the county commission decision makers as findings where the written statement was not adopted by the board of county commissioners as findings. Hellberg v. Morrow County, 49 Or LUBA 423 (2005).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Although all legislative decisions need not be supported by findings when the local government can supply argument and citation to the record in its brief to demonstrate compliance with the applicable criteria, such arguments must be based on evidence contained in the record rather than created out of whole cloth. Naumes Properties, LLC v. City of Central Point, 46 Or LUBA 304 (2004).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government quasi-judicial land use decision maker is not legally required to verbally explain how all legal and evidentiary issues are resolved. It is the written decision that the decision maker ultimately adopts that is subject to LUBA's review on appeal. Lord v. City of Oregon City, 43 Or LUBA 361 (2002).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Even absent a specific legal requirement that a legislative decision be supported by findings, remand may be necessary if LUBA and the appellate courts cannot perform their review function without the missing findings to determine whether applicable decision making criteria are satisfied. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A decision maker may rely on environmental assessments and technical reports prepared and used by the decision maker in making its decision to demonstrate compliance with findings requirements, notwithstanding that the documents were not formally adopted as findings, where a reasonable person would understand that the decision maker intended to rely on the documents to support its decision. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A city council's decision to allow the prevailing party to draft proposed findings in support of a decision to rezone property provides no basis for reversal or remand. Dimone v. City of Hillsboro, 41 Or LUBA 167 (2001).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a city council interprets that a zone change criterion requiring a public need for the use proposed is met where there is a statistical probability that the segment of the population the proposed facility will serve will need the facility, LUBA will defer to that interpretation. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. The Portland City Code does not require that the city adopt findings of fact to support its legislative decisions. Therefore, on appeal to LUBA, the city may rely upon citations to the comprehensive plan, code, the record and arguments in its brief to demonstrate that the legislative decision is consistent with applicable plan and code provisions. Home Depot, Inc. v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 870 (2000).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A city does not err by failing to address a comprehensive plan policy that requires an impact assessment for in-water structures, where the decision does not approve any in-water structures. Marine Street LLC v. City of Astoria, 37 Or LUBA 587 (2000).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. The duty to coordinate under Goal 2 and ORS 197.015(5) does not mandate success in accommodating the needs or legitimate interests of all affected governmental agencies, but it does mandate a reasonable effort to accommodate those needs and legitimate interests "as much as possible." For LUBA to be able to determine that this coordination obligation has been satisfied, a local government must respond in its findings to "legitimate concerns" that are expressed by affected governmental agencies. Turner Community Association v. Marion County, 37 Or LUBA 324 (1999).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Although there is no statutory requirement that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, such findings may be required by local ordinance. Barnard Perkins Corp. v. City of Rivergrove, 34 Or LUBA 660 (1998).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a local government decision appears to authorize a nonconforming use and additional dwelling without notice or findings to support those approvals, LUBA will remand the decision. DLCD v. Curry County, 33 Or LUBA 728 (1997).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government's findings cannot defer a determination on discretionary approval criteria to a later stage without providing the same notice and comment period provided in the initial proceeding. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government cannot defer its obligation to make findings of compliance with applicable approval criteria to a state agency. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government may impose conditions necessary to ensure compliance with applicable water availability criteria only when the findings adequately establish that compliance with those criteria is feasible. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a zoning ordinance provision is an aspirational standard, a county need not make findings pertaining to the aspirational standard. Sparks v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 325 (1996).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. The county must itself analyze and evaluate relevant facts in its findings to show how it reached its decision; it cannot do that analysis for the first time in its brief to LUBA. DLCD v. Coos County, 30 Or LUBA 229 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government is not required to make findings to address criteria that it has found to be inapplicable. East Lancaster Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Salem, 30 Or LUBA 147 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. While ORS 197.835(9) requires LUBA to affirm a local government decision in the absence of adequate findings if the parties identify evidence that "clearly supports" the decision, "clearly supports" will be interpreted narrowly to mean "makes obvious" or "makes inevitable." Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. ORS 197.835(9)(b) and 197.829(2) authorize LUBA to remedy minor oversights and imperfections in local government land use decisions, but do not permit or require LUBA to assume the responsibilities assigned to local governments, such as the weighing of evidence, the preparation of adequate findings and the interpretation of comprehensive plans and local land use regulations. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no statutory or administrative law requirement that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings. However, where a challenged legislative land use decision was made by the local governing body and the apparently applicable legal standards at issue on appeal are local comprehensive plan provisions, the interpretation of those provisions must initially be made by the governing body in its decision. Central Eastside Industrial Council v. Portland, 29 Or LUBA 429 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. When determining whether a nonconforming use exists, a local government's findings must determine whether the use of the subject property existing when restrictive regulations were applied was lawfully established, and the nature and extent of such use. Nehoda v. Coos County, 29 Or LUBA 251 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government may properly grant permit approval based on either (1) a finding that an applicable approval standard is satisfied, or (2) a finding that it is feasible to satisfy an applicable approval standard and the imposition of conditions necessary to ensure that the standard will be satisfied. Burghardt v. City of Molalla, 29 Or LUBA 223 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. While it is the applicants' burden to demonstrate compliance with relevant approval criteria, if a local government determines an approval criterion is not satisfied, it must adopt findings explaining why it believes the applicants failed to meet this burden. Neuman v. Benton County, 29 Or LUBA 172 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no statutory or administrative law requirement that all legislative decisions be supported by findings. However, where there is a local code provision requiring that findings be adopted in support of legislative decisions, the absence of such findings, or the adoption of purely conclusory findings, can provide a basis for reversal or remand. Foster v. Coos County, 28 Or LUBA 609 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no generally applicable legal standard requiring a local government to have a "substantial or reasonable basis" for declining to impose a condition proposed by a party to a local government land use proceeding. Salem Golf Club v. City of Salem, 28 Or LUBA 561 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where the challenged decision does not determine the proposal complies with mandatory approval standards applicable to the proposal or that compliance with such standards is feasible, the local government may not defer a determination of compliance with such standards to the city engineer, to be made in a process not involving notice or hearing. Shapiro v. City of Talent, 28 Or LUBA 542 (1995).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. In order to defer determinations of compliance with mandatory approval standards to a later stage where no public hearing is contemplated, the local government must first determine that compliance with those standards is possible. Welch v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 439 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a challenged permit decision is not supported by any findings, the decision must be remanded. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 274 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Aside from the requirement under Dolan v. City of Tigard for an "individualized determination" justifying a condition of approval imposing an exaction, there is no generally applicable requirement that conditions of land use approval be supported by findings that justify imposing the condition. Davis v. City of Bandon, 28 Or LUBA 38 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. That a legislative land use decision is not supported by findings is not, in itself, a basis for reversal or remand, because no applicable legal standard requires that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings. Redland/Viola/Fischer's Mill CPO v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 560 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no legal requirement that a local government adopt findings to support a legislative land use decision. However, where the local government does not adopt findings explaining why a challenged legislative decision complies with applicable approval criteria, LUBA relies upon the responding parties to provide argument and citations to the record to assist the resolution of petitioners' allegations. DLCD v. Fargo Interchange Service District, 27 Or LUBA 150 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no legal requirement that local governments adopt findings in support of legislative land use decisions. Where a local government does not adopt findings explaining why a challenged legislative land use decision complies with applicable approval criteria, LUBA relies on the responding parties to provide argument and citations to the record to assist in the resolution of petitioners' allegations. Andrews v. City of Brookings, 27 Or LUBA 39 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. For LUBA review of a legislative land use decision, either the legislative land use decision must be accompanied by findings addressing relevant legal standards or the local government must explain in its brief how the challenged legislative decision complies with applicable legal standards. McInnis v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 1 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no requirement that a legislative land use decision redesignating numerous properties include findings specifically setting out the justification for the change in designation made for each affected property. McInnis v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 1 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Although nothing requires that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, in order for LUBA to perform its review function, it is necessary either that legislative land use decisions be accompanied by findings demonstrating compliance with relevant legal standards or that respondent explain in its brief how the challenged legislative decision complies with applicable legal standards. Rea v. City of Seaside, 26 Or LUBA 444 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a local government fails to adopt findings identifying and applying applicable criteria, it is not possible for LUBA to perform its review function. Laine v. City of Rockaway Beach, 26 Or LUBA 417 (1994).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where an approval standard requires that a proposed nonforest dwelling "not interfere seriously with the accepted forestry practices on adjacent lands," a local government must first determine what those accepted forestry practices are. Statements that "logging practices" which have occurred on adjacent properties are "logging" or "salvage logging" are not adequate descriptions of accepted forestry practices. DLCD v. Klamath County, 25 Or LUBA 355 (1993).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Even where a governing body's review of the decision of a lower level decision maker is limited to the evidentiary record below, the governing body must either make its own decision and findings regarding compliance with applicable approval standards, adopt by reference the decision and findings of the lower level decision maker, or in some other way take action such that a decision regarding compliance with applicable approval standards becomes final and subject to appeal to LUBA as part of the governing body's decision. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 312 (1993).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government decision approving a quasi-judicial zone change must be supported by written findings identifying the applicable criteria, setting out the facts relied on and explaining the reasons why the facts establish compliance with the applicable standards. Strecker v. City of Spray, 25 Or LUBA 264 (1993).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. While nothing requires that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, in order for LUBA to perform its review function, it is necessary either that legislative land use decisions be accompanied by findings of compliance with relevant legal standards or that respondents explain in their briefs how the legislative decision complies with applicable legal standards. Riverbend Landfill Company v. Yamhill County, 24 Or LUBA 466 (1993).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. Where a petitioner alleges a zoning map amendment violates plan policies and an LCDC administrative rule, a local government is obligated to adopt findings explaining either why the plan policies and rule do not apply to the disputed zone change or why the zone change is consistent with the plan policies and rule. Recht v. City of Depoe Bay, 24 Or LUBA 129 (1992).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A local government commits no error by failing to adopt findings addressing the impacts of a comprehensive plan transportation map amendment on an inventoried Goal 5 resource site, where the record shows the resource site is located outside the area affected by the challenged plan transportation map amendment. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 23 Or LUBA 565 (1992).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. A challenged land use decision must contain findings addressing the applicable approval standards. Veach v. Wasco County, 23 Or LUBA 515 (1992).

1.5.1 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Generally. There is no prohibition against a local government making a tentative oral decision on a permit application, followed by adoption of a final written decision containing its supporting findings. Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Seaside, 23 Or LUBA 100 (1992).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. When a county is evaluating an application for housing, including needed housing, ORS 197.307(4) (2017) prohibits the county from applying any standards, conditions and procedures that are not clear and objective to the application to develop a residential project, without regard to whether applicant's property is "buildable land" within the meaning of ORS 197.295(1). Warren v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 374 (2018).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. Absent a local or specific statutory requirement that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, such decisions need not be supported by findings as long as LUBA and the appellate courts with the aid of the parties and the record can perform their review function. Friends of Umatilla County v. Umatilla County, 58 Or LUBA 12 (2008).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. ORS 836.623(1) requires explanatory findings addressing evidence that public safety requires a higher level of protection than the minimum set forth under the Airport Transportation Planning rule, even if the local government rejects that evidence and concludes that existing standards are sufficient to protect public safety. Graham Oil Co. v. City of North Bend, 44 Or LUBA 18 (2003).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. The statement in OAR 660-016-0005(a) that a local government is not required to "justify in its comprehensive plan a decision not to include a particular site" in its Goal 5 inventory simply means that the local government need not amend its comprehensive plan to justify a decision not to include a site on its Goal 5 inventory. The rule does not relieve local governments of the obligation to adopt adequate findings justifying a quasi-judicial decision to deny an application to include a site on the Goal 5 inventory. Hegele v. Crook County, 44 Or LUBA 357 (2003).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. Findings adequate to demonstrate that an urban renewal plan "conforms to the comprehensive plan as a whole" pursuant to ORS 457.095(3) must at least (1) set forth the applicable comprehensive plan provisions and (2) express the local government's judgment as to the relationship between the renewal plan and the pertinent plan provisions. While the phrase "as a whole" in ORS 457.095(3) may allow the local government to balance competing plan policies, it does not allow the local government to address only some policies it identifies as being applicable and, without explanation, fail to address others also identified as applicable. Zimmerman v. Columbia County, 40 Or LUBA 483 (2001).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. ORS 197.625(3)(b) requires that approval of a land use subject to an unacknowledged land use standard include findings of compliance with applicable goals. Until the land use standard is acknowledged to comply with applicable goals, the local government cannot rely solely upon the regulatory scope of that standard to avoid addressing compliance with potentially applicable goals. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 922 (2000).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. Contrary to the contention that limited land use decisions require only cursory findings, ORS 227.173(2), which states the requirement for findings in support of a city permit approval, makes no distinction between land use decision findings and limited land use decision findings. Design Home Construction v. City of Silverton, 32 Or LUBA 452 (1997).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. In order to demonstrate compliance with ORS 215.296(1), county findings must: (1) describe the farm and forest practices on surrounding lands devoted to farm or forest use; (2) explain why the proposed use will not force a significant change in those practices; and (3) explain why the proposed use will not significantly increase the cost of those practices. Brown v. Union County, 32 Or LUBA 168 (1996).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. The requirements of ORS 215.296 apply directly to uses allowed in EFU zones under ORS 215.283(2). In order to establish a proposed use satisfies the requirements of ORS 215.296, the local government must adopt findings establishing the proposal complies with that statute. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 281 (1995).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. Where the aerial spray applicator formerly used by an orchard will not spray orchards surrounded by a golf course and the only sprayer who will charges 2000 dollars more to do so, the county's findings must explain why this cost increase, viewed cumulatively with any other cost increases attributable to the golf course, is not significant. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 28 Or LUBA 362 (1994).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. In denying a request for permit approval, ORS 215.416(9) requires that a county provide an explanation of why the county believes the request fails to satisfy applicable standards. Where the required explanation is missing, LUBA will remand the decision. Ball and Associates v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 525 (1993).

1.5.2 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statutes. While ORS 215.416(9) does not require that findings include citations to, or verbatim quotes of, applicable approval standards, it does require that a reasonable person be able to determine from the local government's decision what it considered to be the relevant criteria and standards. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 312 (1993).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. In amending a transportation systems plan (TSP) to locate a bypass through an industrial area, a local government is not obligated to adopt findings regarding the post-amendment adequacy of its inventory of commercial and industrial lands, where the acknowledged zoning district that applies to those lands already anticipates that at least some of those lands may be used for transportation facilities. Land Watch of Lane County v. Lane County, 74 Or LUBA 76 (2016).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. In amending an acknowledged zoning ordinance to reduce maximum building heights, a city is not required to demonstrate that the amendment complies with the statewide planning goals where the acknowledged comprehensive plan contains "specific policies or other provisions which provide the basis for the regulation." ORS 197.835(7)(b). However, where the comprehensive plan includes only general policies that make no reference to maximum building heights, the city must demonstrate that the amendment complies with the statewide planning goals. Marine Street LLC v. City of Astoria, 37 Or LUBA 587 (2000).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. A decision amending a comprehensive plan must specifically identify the applicable statewide planning goals and include findings that substantively address how the proposed comprehensive plan amendment assures compliance with those goals. It is insufficient to make passing reference to the general subject matter of the goals in addressing other approval criteria. Larvik v. City of La Grande, 34 Or LUBA 467 (1998).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. A finding that the subject property contains no identified Goal 5 resources is not adequate to address the Goal 4 requirement that "other forested lands" be designated as forest lands if such lands are needed to maintain soil, water, air, fish and wildlife resources. DLCD v. Curry County, 33 Or LUBA 728 (1997).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. In reviewing a county's legislative comprehensive plan amendment, LUBA does not require detailed findings, but Goal 2 requires a local government to explain why the amendment complies with applicable Statewide Planning Goals. The required explanation can appear in findings, in the record or in the brief the local government files with LUBA. Valerio v. Union County, 33 Or LUBA 604 (1997).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. The Goal 2 coordination requirement must be met by adopted findings that respond to state agency concerns. A statement in the record that county staff rejected state agency concerns does not satisfy the coordination requirement. DLCD v. Douglas County, 33 Or LUBA 216 (1997).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. If it is obvious from the record that a particular goal does not apply to a proposed comprehensive plan amendment, it is not a basis for remand that the local government has not actually stated in its written decision that the goal does not apply. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. All comprehensive plan amendments must comply with the Statewide Planning Goals. When adopting a comprehensive plan amendment, it is the local government's obligation to explain in its findings why the plan amendment complies with the goals or why arguably applicable goal standards need not be addressed and satisfied. O'Rourke v. Union County, 29 Or LUBA 303 (1995).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. The coordination obligation imposed by Statewide Planning Goal 2 (Land Use Planning), and similarly worded local government comprehensive plan provisions, does not require that a local government accede to every concern expressed by a state agency, but does require that a local government adopt findings responding to legitimate concerns expressed by a state agency. ONRC v. City of Seaside, 29 Or LUBA 39 (1995).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. When a property's plan and zone designations are changed to allow a particular use, Goal 6 requires the local government to adopt findings explaining why it is reasonable to expect that applicable state and federal environmental quality standards can be met by the proposed use. Goal 6 does not require the local government to demonstrate its decision will not cause any adverse environmental impact on individual properties. Salem Golf Club v. City of Salem, 28 Or LUBA 561 (1995).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. Comprehensive plan amendments must comply with the Statewide Planning Goals. ORS 197.175(2)(a). Where a challenged comprehensive plan amendment does not address Goal 9 (Economic Development), and Goal 9 appears to be relevant to the challenged decision, LUBA will remand the decision. Graville Properties, Ltd. v. City of Eugene, 27 Or LUBA 583 (1994).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. Where amendments to an exclusive farm use (EFU) zoning district do not change the maximum allowable density of nonfarm dwellings in PUDs, but may have the effect of increasing the numbers of, and circumstances in which, residential PUDs may be approved on EFU-zoned land, the county must consider these potential secondary effects of the amendments in determining whether the EFU zone, as amended, complies with Goals 11 and 14. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Marion County, 27 Or LUBA 303 (1994).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. No statute or appellate court case requires that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings. Absent allegations by petitioner that a legislative decision violates particular legal standards, a local government's failure to adopt findings in support of that legislative decision addressing the statewide planning goals and local comprehensive plan is not, of itself, a basis for reversal or remand of the decision. Oregon City Leasing, Inc. v. Columbia County, 25 Or LUBA 129 (1993).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. Where Statewide Planning Goals are apparently applicable to a comprehensive plan amendment, a local government must either explain in its decision why the amendment complies with such apparently applicable goals, explain why those goals do not apply to the proposed plan amendment or explain why an exception to those goals is justified. ODOT v. City of Newport, 23 Or LUBA 408 (1992).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. To adopt a quasi-judicial plan amendment, a local government must make findings establishing the proposed amendment is in compliance with the Statewide Planning Goals. ODOT v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 370 (1992).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. In amending its comprehensive plan, it is error for a local government to neither explain in its decision why apparently applicable Statewide Planning Goals do not apply, adopt findings demonstrating compliance with such goals, nor take an exception to such goals. ODOT v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 370 (1992).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. To adopt a quasi-judicial comprehensive plan amendment, a local government must adopt findings establishing the proposed amendment is in compliance with the Statewide Planning Goals. Klein v. City of Hubbard, 23 Or LUBA 367 (1992).

1.5.3 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Statewide Goals. In amending its comprehensive plan, it is a local government's obligation to explain in its findings why apparently applicable Statewide Planning Goal standards need not be addressed and satisfied. It is error for a local government to neither identify any goals applicable to a proposed plan amendment nor explain why apparently applicable goals are satisfied. Klein v. City of Hubbard, 23 Or LUBA 367 (1992).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. Where audio recording of the hearing at which a motion to adopt a proposed plan was passed discloses that the motion also was sufficient to adopt a separate supporting findings document, the fact that the motion described in the minutes of that hearing makes no mention of the separate findings document provides no basis for remand. Parker Johnstone Wilsonville Honda v. ODOT, 62 Or LUBA 116 (2010).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. Even where no authority requires findings in support of a legislative decision, there must be enough in the way of findings or accessible material in the record to show that applicable criteria were applied and required considerations considered. Where the record of the legislative rezoning decision includes no findings or accessible material supporting the local government's view that the Transportation Planning Rule (TPR) does not apply to the decision, the local government can avoid remand only if it demonstrates in its response brief, as a matter of law, that the TPR does not apply to the rezoning decision and is not a required consideration. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. The statement in OAR 660-016-0005(a) that a local government is not required to "justify in its comprehensive plan a decision not to include a particular site" in its Goal 5 inventory simply means that the local government need not amend its comprehensive plan to justify a decision not to include a site on its Goal 5 inventory. The rule does not relieve local governments of the obligation to adopt adequate findings justifying a quasi-judicial decision to deny an application to include a site on the Goal 5 inventory. Hegele v. Crook County, 44 Or LUBA 357 (2003).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. Read together with OAR 731-015-0075(7)'s express requirement for findings adequate to establish that a proposal complies with an affected local government's comprehensive plan, the OAR 731-015-0075(2) requirement for more extensive findings if the proposal requires comprehensive plan amendments cannot be interpreted to mean that only cursory findings are needed where no comprehensive plan amendments are required. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. Committed exception findings must explain what it is about existing parcel size and ownership patterns that irrevocably commit resource land to nonresource use, specify the location of parcels created prior to application of the Goals, and distinguish those parcels created pursuant to the Goals. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. Assuming that the existence of water and sewer lines on adjacent lands may be relevant to whether a property is irrevocably committed to nonresource use, findings must explain what that relevance is. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. The primary purpose of OAR 660-021-0030(5) is to develop findings that can form the basis of comprehensive plan language to guide future urbanization decisions. Thus, OAR 660-021-0030(5) requires that the local government adopt findings describing the results of its consideration of the suitability criteria in OAR 660-010-0030(2) for all lands included in urban reserves. D.S. Parklane Development, Inc. v. Metro, 35 Or LUBA 516 (1999).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. OAR 660-33-030(6) requires that the "more detailed data" upon which the county may rely in determining soil capability for forest uses be related to the SCS soils classification system and, therefore, before the county can rely on more detailed data, the county must establish that the source of the data has the requisite knowledge of the classification system, including the qualifications and expertise to classify soils under the system. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. A finding that soils could be reclassified to Class VII does not establish that the soils are Class VII or that even if they are Class VII, the classification renders the site unsuitable for forest use without evaluation of other relevant factors. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.5.4 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Administrative Rules. Where a legislative comprehensive plan amendment adopts policies arguably relevant to OAR 660-12-060, either the decision must be supported by findings addressing OAR 660-12-060 or respondents must demonstrate, through arguments in their briefs and citation to provisions of the local government's plan and regulations or the record that the challenged policies comply with OAR 660-12-060. Opus Development Corp. v. City of Eugene, 28 Or LUBA 670 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirements for Findings – Local Standards. Arguments that the city council's findings are inadequate because they do not explain why the city council disagreed with the planning commission provide no basis for reversal or remand where the city council adopted findings explaining its reasons for concluding that the criteria are met and where the petitioner does not identify any requirement in the code or elsewhere for the city council to explain why it reached a different conclusion than the planning commission. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Bandon, 81 Or LUBA 285 (2020).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. When a code provision requires geotechnical analysis, the feasibility of the planned development must be shown at the preliminary plan stage; however, technical matters that require expert evaluation may be deferred to administrative review and final plan approval even when final plan approval does not require a public hearing. Lundeen v. City of Waldport, 78 Or LUBA 95 (2018).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. When local code sets out independent grounds for granting a variance, and when only one of three rezoning criteria must be met in order to grant a rezoning, and the city adequately demonstrated that one criterion was satisfied, LUBA need not consider arguments relating to the other two criteria. American Tower Corp v. City of Tualatin, 78 Or LUBA 350 (2018).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a hearings officer's interpretive findings in support of his conclusion that a front setback and height standard qualify as "site-related development standards" are inadequate, LUBA will nevertheless affirm the hearings officer's decision where the hearings officer's decision is (1) consistent with prior hearings officer decisions, (2) consistent with prior city council decision, (3) consistent with relevant purpose statements, and (4) consistent with the relevant legislative history. Patel v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 349 (2018).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A city council's findings that a master plan design guideline to "[d]evelop buildings that are appropriately scaled to the neighborhood," is met by a proposal to build a seven-story apartment building with a five-story wing rather than a four-story wing, representing a proposal to increase the building height by 10 feet, where surrounding buildings range in height from three to seven stories, is not in error. Such a finding is sufficient to satisfy city's local ordinance which requires a finding that under a proposed modification "[t]he resulting development will better meet the applicable design guidelines," and that "[o]n balance the proposal will be consistent with the purpose of the standard modified" where the 10-foot modification represents a trade-off for a clipped corner which allows for increased pedestrian access and sunlight into a proposed public square. Michaelson v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 504 (2018).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A city council's comparative approach of evaluating all design changes related to a proposed development modification at once to determine whether the resulting development better meets applicable guidelines, is not error. The nature of design review often involves tradeoffs and balancing between design features to achieve a more optimal overall design under the applicable guidelines. Michaelson v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 504 (2018).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Even if there is no state or local standard that requires that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, a legislative land use decision must be supported by findings or accessible material in the record that is sufficient to show that applicable criteria were applied and any required considerations were considered. An unexplained finding that the comprehensive plan does not require that multifamily housing be located in the city's commercial zone is not sufficient to demonstrate that a zoning ordinance amendment to delete multi-family housing as a permitted use in the city's commercial zone is consistent with the city's comprehensive plan. Cassidy v. City of Glendale, 66 Or LUBA 314 (2012).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local government decision that determines that an entire property is located on a foredune and denies an application for a dwelling based on that determination will be remanded where the findings do not explain why the local government reached the conclusion it reached and the conclusion is not supported by any evidence in the record identified by the local government. Rudell v. City of Bandon, 62 Or LUBA 279 (2010).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where an applicable comprehensive plan policy and intergovernmental agreement provision require a city to determine that adequate public services are available to a property that is proposed to be annexed, a city errs in failing to adopt findings regarding the availability of police protection. Bowler v. City of Cave Junction, 56 Or LUBA 152 (2008).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. LUBA will reject an argument that a legislative decision must be remanded to adopt findings addressing whether a proposed land use regulation is consistent with applicable comprehensive plan policies, where the petitioner identifies no local obligation to adopt findings, and the local government cites to a staff report that concludes the regulation is consistent with applicable plan policies. J.T. Smith Companies v. City of West Linn, 54 Or LUBA 339 (2007).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a non-duplicative plat name is a criterion for preliminary plat approval, a city does not err by granting preliminary plat approval without a plat name and imposing a condition of approval that the applicant submit a non-duplicative plat name prior to final plat approval. For such an approval criterion, it is at most harmless error that the city failed to find that it is feasible for the applicant to submit the required non-duplicative plat name. Frewing v. City of Tigard, 47 Or LUBA 331 (2004).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Findings challenges are necessarily derivative of the underlying criteria the findings address. Where the county code requires adoption of findings supporting legislative decisions, whether jurisdiction to review an adequate findings challenge in a legislative decision adopted to fulfill a periodic review work task lies with LUBA or LCDC depends on whether the findings address goal or rule compliance issues subject to LCDC's exclusive jurisdiction. City of Woodburn v. Marion County, 45 Or LUBA 423 (2003).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local code requirement for findings demonstrating that legislative decisions are "in the public interest and will be of general public benefit" does not implicate any Goal or rule requirements, and thus a challenge that the local government failed to adopt adequate findings addressing that criterion in adopting a decision to fulfill a periodic review work task is subject to LUBA's exclusive jurisdiction. City of Woodburn v. Marion County, 45 Or LUBA 423 (2003).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A county commits no error in applying a zoning code requirement that a conditional use be found to be in harmony with the purpose and intent of the zone as a mandatory approval criterion where the provision expressly requires that determination. The county's identification in its notice of hearing of the chapter in which that zoning code requirement appears is sufficient to give the applicant notice of that approval criterion where the chapter is short and code requirement for a finding concerning that criterion is clear. Hick v. Marion County, 43 Or LUBA 483 (2003).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local planned unit development (PUD) requirement that development preserve "significant on-site resources" and "worthwhile natural features" does not impose an absolute requirement that significant vegetation and other natural resources must be preserved in all cases. A local government does not commit error by balancing such preservation requirements with other code requirements and explaining why in some cases the preservation requirement is sacrificed to achieve other code requirements. Dept. of Transportation v. City of Eugene, 38 Or LUBA 814 (2000).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a county code provision specifically requires findings documenting whether there is a need for additional land for a particular purpose and whether the timing is appropriate to rezone land for that purpose, but the county interprets the code provision to not require documentation of the need and timing elements in a particular instance, that interpretation is inconsistent with the express language of the provision and "clearly wrong." Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 357 (2000).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local standard requiring adequate access to the subject property is not inapplicable merely because the road in issue is private rather than public. Highland Condominium Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 37 Or LUBA 13 (1999).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Although there is no statutory requirement that legislative land use decisions be supported by findings, such findings may be required by local ordinance. Barnard Perkins Corp. v. City of Rivergrove, 34 Or LUBA 660 (1998).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local government cannot defer its obligation to make findings of compliance with applicable approval criteria to a state agency. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a city interprets its code erosion control standards as imposing construction guidelines, not approval standards requiring feasibility findings, LUBA must defer to that interpretation unless it is clearly wrong. Arnett v. City of Lake Oswego, 33 Or LUBA 384 (1997).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. In applying a code approval standard that requires the identification of an area whose stability might be affected by a proposed development, the county's findings may not rely on inconsistent definitions of the area. Ray v. Douglas County, 32 Or LUBA 388 (1997).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A code approval standard that requires "a clear picture of the existing land use pattern" in a specified area is not satisfied by general findings about zoning and details about some of the properties in the area. Ray v. Douglas County, 32 Or LUBA 388 (1997).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local government decision granting site plan approval for off-street parking use of property containing an existing dwelling must address issues raised by petitioners concerning whether the approved site plan results in violations of code yard and setback requirements for the existing dwelling. Jackman v. City of Tillamook, 29 Or LUBA 391 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Findings supporting a local government decision that a proposed comprehensive plan amendment is a "major" plan amendment under the local code must explain the rationale for that conclusion. Quoting the code definition of "major" plan amendment and referring to unspecified principles or policies is not sufficient. Cone v. City of Eugene, 29 Or LUBA 133 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. The coordination obligation imposed by Statewide Planning Goal 2 (Land Use Planning), and similarly worded local government comprehensive plan provisions, does not require that a local government accede to every concern expressed by a state agency, but does require that a local government adopt findings responding to legitimate concerns expressed by a state agency. ONRC v. City of Seaside, 29 Or LUBA 39 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the local code requires a determination that the proposal be in harmony with the natural environment in the area, and there is no dispute that native plant communities are a relevant characteristic of the natural environment, the decision must include findings determining the proposal is in harmony with the native plant communities in the natural environment. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the local code requires a determination that the proposal have minimal adverse impacts on the surrounding area, and the subject property is located within a wild and scenic river corridor, the decision must include findings evaluating the proposal's impacts on the wild and scenic river corridor. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the local code requires the proposal have only minimal impacts on adjacent properties, considering the operating characteristics of the proposed use, the decision must identify what the operating characteristics of the proposed use are. Friends of the Metolius v. Jefferson County, 28 Or LUBA 591 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a local government finds that a proposed road alignment is consistent with plan policies calling for a balanced transportation system designed to minimize energy impacts because it will shorten travel distance to a light rail station, that the facility will also shorten travel distance to a major arterial does not, of itself, mean the plan policies are violated. Friends of Cedar Mill v. Washington County, 28 Or LUBA 477 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the challenged decision is made by a governing body and does not explain whether or to what extent apparently applicable comprehensive plan standards apply to the proposal, the challenged decision must be remanded for such an explanation. Lamm v. City of Portland, 28 Or LUBA 468 (1995).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the local code requires that certain "factors" be considered, a finding that the subject property is located in a school district is not responsive to the factor "school district service capability," because the finding says nothing about the capability of the school district to serve the proposed development. McNamara v. Union County, 28 Or LUBA 396 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the comprehensive plan requires a zone change application to demonstrate the chosen site is superior or equal to alternative sites, findings that simply state no one identified alternative sites during the local proceedings are inadequate to establish compliance with the plan standard. Neuman v. City of Albany, 28 Or LUBA 337 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a local government interprets a comprehensive plan provision using the word "should" as imposing a nonmandatory consideration, findings demonstrating compliance with the plan provision are not required. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a code standard requires that conditional uses "preserve assets of particular interest to the community," local government findings supporting approval of a proposed conditional use must explain whether a natural feature that will be affected by the conditional use is such an asset and, if so, why the standard is satisfied. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 178 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a local government decision identifies a number of comprehensive plan provisions as approval standards for a request to cut trees, it may not approve the request without adopting findings demonstrating that the application complies with the identified plan policies. Gettman v. City of Bay City, 28 Or LUBA 116 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where an applicable comprehensive plan policy requires that residential uses adjacent to forestlands have adequate setbacks and fire prevention measures, a local government decision approving a forest dwelling must be supported by findings establishing what setbacks and fire prevention measures are required and why they are adequate. Furler v. Curry County, 27 Or LUBA 546 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where petitioner contends the challenged decision fails to address a comprehensive plan provision that appears to contain a standard applicable to the proposal, the local government must explain in its decision why the plan provision either is inapplicable to the proposal or is satisfied by the proposal. LUBA may not make such determinations in the first instance. Laine v. City of Rockaway Beach, 27 Or LUBA 493 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the local code's definition of "northern lot line" is ambiguous and recognizes there can be more than one northern lot line on any given piece of property, and the challenged decision determining compliance with solar access setback requirements simply contains a conclusory statement that a flag lot has only one northern lot line, LUBA will remand the decision for adoption of interpretive findings. Sullivan v. City of Ashland, 27 Or LUBA 411 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a county proposes to change the zoning of agricultural land designated Farm/Forest on its comprehensive plan map, a standard that "the purpose of the Comprehensive Plan and Zoning Ordinance will be carried out by approving the proposal" requires the county to explain how the proposed zone change carries out the purpose of the Farm/Forest plan designation and the plan agricultural goals. DLCD v. Polk County, 27 Or LUBA 345 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Findings which do not identify the provisions of the statewide planning goals, comprehensive plan or local code that govern a challenged code amendment are inadequate to satisfy a local code requirement that all code amendments be supported by findings explaining why the amendment complies with any relevant plan, code and statewide planning goal requirements. Andrews v. City of Brookings, 27 Or LUBA 39 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. In addressing a code requirement that a proposed conditional use satisfy state regulatory requirements, a local government determination that an exemption from certain state regulations applies must be reasonable. However, the local government need not establish that such a determination is correct. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a petitioner lists a number of apparently relevant comprehensive plan policies and argues the local government erred by not addressing the policies in its decision, petitioner's argument is sufficiently developed for LUBA review, and the decision must be remanded so that the local government can address those policies in its findings. Waugh v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 300 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local government decision that a shopping center may be allowed in a particular zone under code "similar use" provisions must (1) express an interpretation of the "similar use" provisions that is adequate for LUBA review, (2) actually apply the interpretation adopted, and (3) explain how the decision is consistent with that interpretation. Loud v. City of Cottage Grove, 26 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. To find compliance with a local code requirement that schools be adequate to meet anticipated demand, a local government must find that existing school facilities are adequate to serve the proposed project or that they can be made adequate by employing available techniques to maximize school facility capacity. Langford v. City of Eugene, 26 Or LUBA 60 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. In order to determine compliance with a code permit approval standard requiring that "the proposed use will not alter the character of the surrounding area" in a particular manner, the local government must first identify the "surrounding area" to be considered. Spiering v. Yamhill County, 25 Or LUBA 695 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a subdivision approval standard simply requires connection with a storm drainage system, and there is no allegation that the subdivision cannot be connected to a storm drainage system, allegations that the challenged decision fails to find the storm drainage system will be adequate to handle storm water provide no basis for reversal or remand of the decision. Day v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 468 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A determination that an onsite dwelling is essential to carrying out the proposed forest management operation, supported by adequate findings and substantial evidence, demonstrates compliance with a local standard requiring that a forest management dwelling be "necessary for * * * a permitted forest use." DLCD v. Coos County, 25 Or LUBA 158 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. No statute or appellate court case requires that all legislative land use decisions be supported by findings. Absent allegations by petitioner that a legislative decision violates particular legal standards, a local government's failure to adopt findings in support of that legislative decision addressing the statewide planning goals and local comprehensive plan is not, of itself, a basis for reversal or remand of the decision. Oregon City Leasing, Inc. v. Columbia County, 25 Or LUBA 129 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a county approves a 120 unit PUD on rural land, but fails to address plan policies limiting the provision of urban public services on rural land, a remand is required so that the county may adopt findings explaining why these standards are not violated by the proposed PUD. DLCD v. Crook County, 25 Or LUBA 98 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. To demonstrate compliance with a local code approval standard requiring that a proposed use be compatible with "existing adjacent permitted uses," a local government must identify the existing adjacent permitted uses. A necessary step in identifying such uses is identifying what constitutes the "adjacent" area to be considered. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a local code standard requires that creation of new nonfarm and nonforest parcels be consistent with comprehensive plan forest and agriculture policies, the local government's findings must demonstrate compliance with all such plan policies or explain why they do not apply. DLCD v. Curry County, 24 Or LUBA 200 (1992).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where the code requires that a proposed development be compatible with "adjacent residential developments," based on certain characteristics, the local government must (1) identify "adjacent residential developments," and (2) explain why the proposed development will be compatible, considering the specified characteristics. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 98 (1992).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Where a code provides that changes having significant impacts are major PUD amendments, and lists categories of changes that might result in significant impacts, whether a proposed amendment falls within a category on the list is not in itself determinative of whether the amendment is major. Because the categories are not independent bases for identifying a major amendment, a determination that a proposed PUD amendment is not major need not be supported by findings addressing each category. Gage v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 47 (1992).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A general plan policy concerning transportation safety does not require that findings supporting a legislative comprehensive plan transportation map amendment negate every potential safety problem that might result from future implementation of the improvements authorized by the plan amendment. Davenport v. City of Tigard, 23 Or LUBA 565 (1992).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. A local government must determine compliance with a code standard requiring that a proposed golf course will have no significant adverse impact on wildlife. The local government may not leave a determination of compliance with a code approval standard to a state agency. Kaye v. Marion County, 23 Or LUBA 452 (1992).

1.5.5 Administrative Law – Requirement for Findings – Local Standards. Findings which state that the additional traffic generated by a proposed use would have "an insignificant additional impact" on the affected roads and would not result in "an unreasonable increase" in dust, are sufficient to demonstrate compliance with a code requirement that the proposed use "will have minimal adverse impact on the livability, value or appropriate development of abutting properties or the surrounding area," with regard to adverse impacts from traffic and dust. Avgeris v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 124 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's conclusion that a pesticide or herbicide label requires no setback from recreational areas, and, therefore, that approving a recreational area on EFU land will not force a significant change in accepted farm practices on surrounding lands devoted to farm use for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), is not supported by substantial evidence where farmers and the Oregon Department of Agriculture interpret the label as requiring a setback that could preclude application of the herbicide in significant portions of farmland adjacent to the proposed recreational area and where there is no expert testimony supporting the county's interpretation. Schrepel v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 895 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicant for a CUP to host events as a home occupation on land zoned EFU plans to be on-site during events to assist with general coordination, parking, and other activities, and where conditions of approval make the applicant responsible for operational matters such as maintaining the event calendar to comply with limits on the number of events as well as monitoring noise and sign removal, substantial evidence exists to support a conclusion that the applicant will "operate[]" the home occupation, within the meaning of ORS 215.448(1)(a), even where they plan to have no full-time employees and to allow customers to hire their own contractors, as necessary. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 664 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicant for a CUP to host events as a home occupation on land zoned EFU explains how events can be conducted with no more than five employees on-site at one time by scheduling activities, preparing food off-site, utilizing buffet-style service, and planning and making arrangements in advance, and where a condition of approval limits the home occupation to no more than five employees on-site, substantial evidence exists to support a conclusion that the applicant will "employ on site no more than five full-time or part-time persons," within the meaning of ORS 215.448(1)(b), even given the complex planning and implementation that a 300-guest wedding entails. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 664 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicant for a CUP to host events as a home occupation on land zoned EFU plans to renovate an existing barn by adding restrooms and "Brides and Grooms rooms" and by eliminating horse stalls, substantial evidence does not exist to support a conclusion that the renovated barn would "otherwise be allowed in the zone," for purposes of ORS 215.448(3). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 664 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicant for a CUP to host events as a home occupation on land zoned EFU plans to construct a new, free-standing restroom building with septic system capacity to serve 300 people per event, substantial evidence does not exist to support a conclusion that the new restroom building would be accessory to or customarily associated with an existing dwelling on EFU land. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 664 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An affidavit of the owner of the subject property stating that a particular structure is removable does not establish, as a matter of law, that the structure is removable where photographs depict the structure as being located on the subject property during the rainy season over many years. Armstrong v. Jackson County, 81 Or LUBA 651 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings concluding that an aggregate quarry would be compatible with an adjacent grazing operation and periodic logging are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence without an explanation of the manner in which the grazing operation is run—for example, whether it is seasonal or includes accessory activities such as breeding or calving—and the nature of the periodic logging. Currie v. Douglas County, 81 Or LUBA 602 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings concluding that an aggregate quarry satisfies the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1) are inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence where the county identifies grazing as the only surrounding farm or forest use but does not verify that the grazing operation is in fact limited to grazing, without other uses such as breeding, or establish that logging on the grazing property, government ownership of surrounding forest lands, or maintaining of surrounding forest land as a timber investment do not involve protected forest activity. Currie v. Douglas County, 81 Or LUBA 602 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local code provision requires that a "declaration of anticipated noise levels" be attached to certain land use approvals and that applicants incorporate noise abatement strategies where noise levels are anticipated to exceed a certain threshold, the word "declaration" anticipates more than a statement from the applicant's attorney, without supporting documents or studies, and a reasonable person would not rely on such statements alone to conclude that the noise threshold is not exceeded. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local code provision prohibits development, including fill, in certain special flood hazard areas unless the cumulative effect of the development, when combined with all other existing and anticipated development, will not increase the base flood elevation (BFE) more than one foot, a reasonable person would not rely on a letter from a professional engineer, which provides that the "minimal amounts of fill placed below the BFE" would have no measurable effect on the BFE, to conclude that the provision is satisfied, where the letter does not quantify the amount of fill associated with the development or address the cumulative effects of all other existing and anticipated development. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person would rely on an applicant's testimony regarding their activities managing a farm and their status as the state license holder for an industrial hemp-growing operation to conclude that the applicant is a farm operator and continues to play the "predominant role" in management and farm use of the farm, for purposes of OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a), even where they have hired another company to prepare the farmland for planting hemp seed and to provide consultation regarding hemp growing. Wachal v. Linn County, 81 Or LUBA 561 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the applicable law does not expressly require expert testimony to establish compliance, while a reasonable decision-maker might not be able to rely on lay testimony where the record contains contrary expert testimony, a reasonable decision-maker might be able to rely on lay testimony where the record contains no contrary expert testimony. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 400 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local code provision implementing OAR 660-006-0029 requires the decision-maker "to identify the building site" for a forest template dwelling by "weigh[ing] together" (1) the requirement to minimize the amount of forest lands used and (2) fire-safety development design standards, written testimony previously submitted in a different land use proceeding by lay individuals with personal knowledge that suggests that serious slope issues have prevented improving one alternative access route because of inability or expense of meeting local road design standards is substantial evidence that improving that alternative access route is impracticable where no contrary evidence is introduced into the record in the current proceeding. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 400 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A negative claim can be proved by negative evidence—that is, evidence that suggests that something is missing—where adequate research or observations have been made so that the negative evidence is evidence upon which a reasonable person would rely. York v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 20 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Evidence of absence (e.g., the record contains affirmative observations that something is missing) may be substantial evidence, but the absence of evidence (e.g., the record contains no evidence that something is not missing) may not. York v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 20 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the record contains evidence that the fire safety measures required for a proposed solar facility exceed those required for an existing Christmas tree farm and extensive observations of fires involving solar panels but no evidence of incidents of injury to fire suppression personnel from electrified solar panels, a conclusion that the solar facility will not "significantly increase risks to fire suppression personnel" for purposes of OAR 660-006-0025(5)(b) is supported by substantial evidence, even though electrical equipment is present on a solar facility and not present on a Christmas tree farm. York v. Clackamas County, 81 Or LUBA 20 (2020).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a decision-maker relies on 40-foot contour maps in the record, sourced from county data, to determine the slopes on the subject property, an argument that the decision-maker erred by disregarding finer-scale, two-foot contour maps that petitioners submitted provides no basis for reversal or remand where the decision-maker reasoned that petitioners' contour maps were "not reliable, accurate or trustworthy evidence" because they were not signed by a registered professional surveyor and because they contained an incorrect scale, and where the petitioners have not otherwise established that credible evidence weighs overwhelmingly in favor of their description of the slopes on the subject property or that the evidence upon which the decision-maker did rely was not substantial evidence. Velasquez v. Jackson County, 80 Or LUBA 1 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local government adopts a post-acknowledgment plan amendment creating a new zone that allows 20-acre lots, an argument that DEQ rules indicate that properties of 10 or more acres in size are generally able to support on-site wastewater systems is not sufficient to establish compliance with Goal 11 with respect to wastewater where those rules appear for the first time in the response brief, where there are no findings or evidence in the record addressing wastewater, and where there is no evidence in the record that the rule is accurate within the portion of the local government's jurisdiction at issue. Similarly, references to the proximity of the majority of candidate lands to fire districts, to evidence that more demand for funds would not be created in one of the districts, to 10 years of data indicating that less than two percent of fires resulted from residential structures, and to local fire protection standards with which future development would be required to comply are not sufficient to establish compliance with Goal 11 with respect to fire protection where there is no analysis of the likelihood of increased fire as more residences are potentially introduced into the area or discussion of the capacity of the existing fire service organizations to provide more service. DLCD v. Douglas County, 80 Or LUBA 98 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a neighbor describes observing, from their living room view, minimal orchard, meadow, and garden-related activity on the property and, other than horses belonging to some of the owners of the property, never seeing any livestock or other animals on the property between 1970 and 2004, and where the neighbor subsequently reiterates that there was no farm use, such as cattle or crops, between 1978 and 1983 and that, during the 1980s, owners of the property kept their show horses on the property, a local government may reasonably conclude that the property was "not managed for three of the five calendar years preceding January 1, 1983, as part of a farm operation that produced $20,000 or more in annual gross income" for purposes of former ORS 197.247(1)(a) (1991), even where the record includes (1) aerial photos from 1979 and 1982, (2) a 1979 permit for a new barn, (3) a 1987 farm dwelling approval, and (4) testimony from other area residents contradicting the neighbor's testimony, where the record does not disclose the proximity of the other area residents' properties to the subject property or whether those area residents had made firsthand observations of the subject property during the relevant statutory period. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. For purposes of designating marginal lands under former ORS 197.247 (1991), it is not enough for an applicant to provide a list of the allegedly qualifying lots or parcels; the applicant must provide foundational evidence that the lots or parcels are lawful and that lots or parcels that were in common ownership on July 1, 1983, are not overcounted. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An attorney-land-use-consultant-prepared ESEE analysis including numerous plans, reports, and other documents supporting the redesignation and rezoning of protected habitat from forest land to marginal land under former ORS 197.247 (1991) is not sufficient to rebut expert testimony including (1) a letter authored by an ODFW biologist that generally discusses the cumulative impact of development on habitat and (2) general ODFW guidance related to levels of residential density in areas of peripheral big game habitat absent evidence of the attorney land use consultant's expertise. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In the context of an application to remove property from a county's Goal 5 inventory of significant aggregate resources, where the county has previously determined, in two separate final, acknowledged decisions—one based on area-specific soils mapping and the other based on periodic review which resulted in an updated inventory—that the property should not be included on the county's Goal 3 inventory of agricultural lands; where the county zoned the property for surface mining, a zone that does not implement Goal 3, after one of those previous determinations; and where the ESEE analysis for the property does not specify a post-mining zoning designation or use, a conclusion that the property is not agricultural land is supported by substantial evidence. The county, having previously determined that the property is not agricultural land, is not required to revisit whether the property is agricultural land. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 80 Or LUBA 252 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In the context of an application to change the comprehensive plan designation of property to Rural Residential Exception Area, where a comprehensive plan provision provides that "any new Rural Residential Exception Areas need to be justified through initiating a non-resource plan amendment and zone change by demonstrating that the property does not meet the definition of agricultural * * * land," a county correctly determines that an applicant satisfies that provision by producing copies of the county's adopted and acknowledged agricultural lands inventories, which do not include the property. Even where an opponent submits an NRCS soils map into the record, which the opponent argues shows the property's soils constitute agricultural lands, where the NRCS website that the opponent used to prepare the soils map includes a disclaimer regarding the large scale of mapping, stating that "[e]nlargement of maps beyond the scale of mapping can cause misunderstanding of the detail of mapping and accuracy of soil line placement," a reasonable decision-maker would rely on the inventories to conclude that the property is not agricultural land, and a reasonable decision-maker could determine that the NRCS soils map is less credible than the inventories. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 80 Or LUBA 252 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a city bureau manages the city's transportation system, including private uses in the city right-of-way, and where bureau staff have special expertise in the safe and efficient use of the right-of-way and various demands on streets, including traffic, parking, and loading, statements from the bureau (1) that studio apartments have lower turnover rates, less need for unloading large furniture, and, thus, less need for a loading space, and (2) that signed, infrequent on-street loading will not have a negative effect on the traffic safety or other transportation functions of the abutting right-of-way are evidence that would permit a reasonable person to find that an on-street loading space is adequate for a proposed studio apartment building's loading needs such that the development continues to meet the intended purpose of, and, therefore, qualifies for an adjustment to, an off-street loading space requirement, even where there is testimony in the record from an opponent of the development regarding anticipated negative congestion and safety impacts of off-street loading. NDNA v. City of Portland, 80 Or LUBA 269 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a city within Metro's jurisdiction adopts its portion of an intergovernmental concept plan into its comprehensive plan and applies an industrial zoning designation to a portion of the planning area with slopes greater than 10 percent, that Metro's previous decision to include the planning area in its UGB stated that land needed for industrial uses should generally have slopes of less than 10 percent and that a previous Metro housing need projection anticipated almost 600 more housing units than the industrial zoning designation would allow provide no basis for reversal or remand where Metro's previous UGB decision is not evidence, an applicable approval criterion, or a relevant consideration for the city in determining the correct zoning designation for the property and where Metro's previous housing need projection has been superseded by a later decision to remove the property from its inventory of buildable residential lands. Watts v. City of Tualatin, 80 Or LUBA 339 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an approved site plan indicates that a replacement dwelling will be sited on an adjacent property, but where the building permit for the replacement dwelling allows a replacement dwelling "in the same footprint as the original home," and where an ArcGIS map marked with distances and existing development indicate that the footprint of the original dwelling was located on the subject property, a conclusion that the subject property does not "include[] a dwelling" for purposes of forest template dwelling approval under ORS 215.750(4)(d) is not supported by substantial evidence. Bielefeld v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 480 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicant proposes to occupy one guest apartment within an 18,000-square-foot dwelling while allowing the remainder of the dwelling and all of its amenities to be used by bed and breakfast guests, a county's conclusion that the bed and breakfast is not a "subordinate use" of the dwelling, and therefore not a home occupation, and that the applicant is not a "resident of the dwelling" is consistent with the plain meaning of the code language and is supported by substantial evidence in the record where there is evidence that the applicant "spends a couple of days a week" at a different home, and that the subject dwelling does not appear to be occupied when viewed from the road or neighboring properties, even though the applicant provides a copy of her driver's license that lists the subject dwelling. Lee v. Marion County, 79 Or LUBA 199 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local code provision provides that issuance of a conditional use permit (CUP) requires a determination that "[t]he proposed use is or may be made compatible with existing adjacent permitted uses and other uses permitted in the underlying zone," a local government decision granting a CUP is not supported by substantial evidence where it does not identify and describe all of the existing and permitted uses on adjacent properties and where it fails to analyze or measure the extent of the potential impacts of the proposed use and instead proceeds straight to mitigation measures. Currie v. Douglas, 79 Or LUBA 585 (2019).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. If an exhibit is attached to the petition for review before LUBA, but that exhibit was not a part of the record made available to the local decision maker, LUBA may not consider it in resolving petitioner's assignment of error. ORS 197.835(2)(a). When the petitioner's argument relies on exhibits not in the record, it provides no basis for reversal or remand of the decision. Newbrook v. City of Portland, 78 Or LUBA 73 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence is a somewhat deferential test LUBA applies in its review of a local government fact-finder's evidentiary judgments. When a hearings officer incorrectly applies the substantial evidence standards of review, ORS 197.835(11)(b) does not authorize LUBA to affirm a decision by reweighing the evidence under the correct standard of evidentiary review. On remand, the hearings officer must reapply the evidence using the correct standard of review—the preponderance of the evidence. Morgan v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 188 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. When an opponent provides evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption under ORS 215.130(10)(a) regarding the existence, continuity, nature and extent of the proposed nonconforming use, the applicant has the burden of demonstrating that the use proposed for verification has existed and continued in its current nature and extent from the date the use became nonconforming, or 20 years prior to the date of application, whichever date is applicable. Morgan v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 188 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. ORS 215.130(11) prohibits a challenge to the lawful establishment element of a nonconforming use which would compel the applicant to submit evidence regarding the nature and extent of the use during periods that are more than 20 years prior to the date of application. A hearings officer cannot adopt findings based on impermissible evidence. Morgan v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 188 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Petitioner's argument that a proposed detached accessory structure for an "art studio" is not a permissible "accessory" structure allowed in the Impacted Forest Lands (F-2) zone provides no basis for reversal or remand where petitioner cites to no local code, state statute or administrative rule governing forest lands, suggesting limitations on accessory structures to a primary dwelling that is otherwise allowed on forest lands under state law. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 78 Or LUBA 272 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's finding that land in the forest zone upon which development is proposed is "flat" is not supported by substantial evidence where the finding is supported only by the applicant's assertion that the relevant slope is "less than 3" percent, but the record includes two topographic maps that appear to show that the slope exceeds 10 percent, which if so triggers additional fire safety requirements. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 78 Or LUBA 272 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the city's code provides that development application materials "shall reflect that consideration has been given to [tree] preservation," the city does not err in finding that the code requirement is met when the applicant's submissions demonstrate that consideration was given to tree preservation through a tree survey and site design that preserves trees within a stand on slopes greater than 25 percent, contains yard sizes that decrease critical root zone impacts, and preserves trees between and around homes. Those application materials reflect that consideration was given to tree preservation even though some high and moderate priority trees must be removed to develop streets, utilities and building pads, and preservation of trees on residential lots would be left to the discretion of future lot owners. The code does not require the actual preservation of trees; instead, the code requires a project applicant to consider tree preservation and submit evidence to demonstrate that such consideration occurred. Fairmount Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 78 Or LUBA 418 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Extension and improvement of a residential access road over an existing public right-of-way is not subject to a city code section that requires streets that are "dedicated to the public by the applicant * * * conform" with adopted street right-of-way maps. A proposed improvement of a type of street that is not depicted on the city's adopted street right-of-way map does not fail to "conform" with that map. Fairmount Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 78 Or LUBA 418 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In considering whether property is generally unsuitable for farm use, it is not appropriate to disregard adjoining parcels as "nonfarm" parcels, simply because there is a nonfarm dwelling on the properties, where there is evidence those adjoining parcels have been planted in winter wheat. Without some findings addressing that evidence of farm use, findings that the property is generally unsuitable for farm use are not supported by substantial evidence. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Crook County, 77 Or LUBA 202 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local governing body commits no error in requesting that a prevailing party prepare written findings for it to adopt. And the governing body commits no error in adopting written findings that deviate from statements made at the final evidentiary hearing, and it is those written findings and not the oral statements that are subject to LUBA review on the merits. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings of fact and law are the decision; they are not evidence. A local governing body commits no error in adopting new findings following a LUBA remand for inadequate findings, without reopening the evidentiary record. Rawson v. Hood River County, 77 Or LUBA 415 (2018).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable decision maker could conclude that a 3,050-square-foot Event Center that is marketed to both hotel patrons and to the general public would generate larger events, with far more event attendees, and more traffic and parking demand from off-site than an Event Center that is conditioned to limit the Event Center use to hotel patrons and their guests only. Hagan v. City of Grants Pass, 76 Or LUBA 196 (2017).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's decision relying upon intervenor's traffic study is supported by substantial evidence where the hearings officer addressed petitioner's challenges to the credibility of the traffic study by citing to testimony of the intervenor's traffic engineer responding to each of petitioner's challenges. Willis v. Clackamas County, 76 Or LUBA 244 (2017).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a city ballot measure that approved the sale or transfer of park land to a school district included a statement that the former park land would "maximize recreational opportunities while preserving significant trees," and the school district's plans preserve 1.28 or 1.6 acres of former park land in its natural forested condition, the development uses only .32 acres of park land for school facilities, preserves many significant trees on the site, expands the school's playground located adjacent to the former park land, and preserves some acreage in a natural park like setting, a reasonable decision maker could find that school district has maximized recreational opportunities. Dodds v. City of West Linn, 75 Or LUBA 24 (2017).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that city streets have adequate capacity to accommodate traffic generated on annexed land is not supported by substantial evidence, where the finding cites and relies only upon extra-record street capacity data found in the transportation system plans of three nearby cities, rather than any evidence in the record. J4J Misc PAC v. City of Jefferson, 75 Or LUBA 120 (2017).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that the noise created by wind turbines site on top of a building located next to a bay will be mitigated by ocean noise and noise generated by nearby sewage pumps is not supported by substantial evidence, where the record includes no evidence concerning how loud the ocean and sewage pumps are at the site of the building. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 75 Or LUBA 350 (2017).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Remand is required where the county standards provide that a parcel created by land sale contract is a legal lot of record only if the contract is (1) dated and signed by the parties, (2) includes a separate legal description, and (3) does not include more than one legal description, but the county concluded that a parcel is as a legal lot of record based on an incomplete copy of a land sale contract without signatures that did not provide a separate legal description for the subject parcel. Grimstad v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 360 (2016).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An applicant's letter detailing the nature and location of a concrete batch plant's fuel tanks, stockpiles and buildings is not sufficient to establish their location as a matter of law or to establish that a hearings officer erred by failing to rely on that letter, where the hearings officer pointed out discrepancies between that letter and other letters submitted by the applicant. Meyer v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 1 (2016).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is conflicting believable evidence regarding whether a proposal to replace a concrete batch plant with an asphalt batch plant would present a greater risk of explosions and damage to surrounding properties, a hearings officer's conclusion that the asphalt batch plant poses a greater risk of explosions and damage is supported by substantial evidence. Meyer v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 1 (2016).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The standard of review that LUBA applies in reviewing substantial evidence challenges to critical findings of fact is not particularly demanding. City findings that a landslide poses a danger to water reservoirs, which are supported by the testimony of two engineers, one of them a geotechnical engineer, are supported by substantial evidence where the contrary evidence is not sufficient to call the testimony of the engineers into question. Fernandez v. City of Portland, 73 Or LUBA 107 (2016).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A memorandum from the city engineer that upsizing sewer pipes, rehabilitating and replacing sewer facilities and adding an infiltration and inflow abatement programs will result in an adequate sewer system is substantial evidence that with those improvements "adequate sewer facilities and services are presently or can be made available with development." Graser-Lindsey v. City of Oregon City, 72 Or LUBA 25 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A board of commissioners could reasonably conclude that a double-wide mobile home was located on property in 1987, the year in which the county approved placement of a temporary medical hardship dwelling, where the record includes the 1987 permit approving placement of the temporary medical hardship dwelling, and that permit included a condition that required connection to the existing septic system. The existence of a septic system already on the property is some evidence of the contemporary existence of the temporary medical hardship dwelling and the double-wide mobile home on the property. Treadway v. Jefferson County, 72 Or LUBA 122 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. For purposes of determining, under OAR 660-033-0130(8)(a)(C)(ii), whether a dwelling was "improperly removed" from the tax roll and whether the dwelling has "taxable value in its present state," a board of commissioners' decision that a dwelling was "improperly removed" from the tax roll is supported by substantial evidence in the record, where the record includes the two most recent years of tax assessor's reports for a single-wide mobile home that describe the mobile home as having two bedrooms and one bathroom and show an assessed value of approximately $1,000. Treadway v. Jefferson County, 72 Or LUBA 122 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government reasonably relies on testimony from a civil engineer that a retaining wall provides support for a parking lot and transmits its imposed load to the earth, notwithstanding that the civil engineer is a member of the board of directors of the non-profit organization applicant, because the engineer's participation on the board of directors does not, in itself, call her professional credibility into question. Knapp v. City of Jacksonville, 72 Or LUBA 299 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Remand is necessary where the findings conclude that the water supply is "adequate" to support proposed residential development because a main water line is located adjacent to the property, but do not address the code requirement to address the availability of water "relative to capacity," and the findings and record do not address capacity or issues raised about the capacity to serve new development while meeting existing obligations. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 71 Or LUBA 14 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable decision maker could rely on planning staff testimony that with zoning ordinance provisions allowing transfer of density, it is not necessary to remove 500,000 cubic yards of rock from a five-acre site to permit the site to be developed residentially. S. St. Helens LLC v. City of St. Helens, 71 Or LUBA 30 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that a proposed truck maintenance home occupation will comply with a 600-square-foot floor area limitation is inadequate and not supported by substantial evidence, where the findings do not address how much floor area employees will use in performing maintenance tasks, and there is no evidence in the record supporting a finding that the physical area occupied by trucks, tools, storage, and the area needed to perform maintenance tasks will occupy no more than 600 square feet. Stevens v. City of Island City, 71 Or LUBA 275 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Notwithstanding that the record includes no evidence quantifying how much water would be transferred between a ranch and a proposed golf course, a county's finding that the water transfer will not significantly change or increase the cost of farming practices on the ranch is supported by substantial evidence, where the ranch manager testifies that in exchange for transferring water, the applicant will improve the ranch's irrigation system, and the ranch anticipates no change in the amount of irrigation water available or irrigation practices. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 71 Or LUBA 297 (2015).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could find based on the evidence in the record that where only a modest increase in vehicle trips is created by a PUD, the PUD is "reasonably compatible with adjacent and nearby land uses," particularly given the inherently subjective nature of the criterion. Oakleigh-McClure Neighbors v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 132 (2014).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Based on evidence in the record that (1) no level of service deficiencies would occur based on new trips added to the area and (2) the PUD will not generate additional traffic above the threshold required for a TIA, A reasonable person could find, that a PUD will have minimal impact on traffic off-site, particularly given the inherently subjective nature of the criterion. Oakleigh-McClure Neighbors v. City of Eugene, 70 Or LUBA 132 (2014).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Land use proceedings are not governed by rules of evidence, and a local government may rely in part on a planner's testimony regarding a phone conversation with the fire district chief, among other evidence, to conclude that the water supply is sufficient for fire suppression, notwithstanding that the fire district chief did not submit direct testimony. Foland v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 247 (2014).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Remand is necessary where the decision (1) approves a two-year intensification of a mining operation and (2) modifies extraction limits to extend the life of the mining operation beyond the initial two-year period, but the only evidence regarding compliance with an approval standard requiring that the existing county road system be "adequate to accommodate the proposed use" addresses only the initial two-year period, not long-term impacts on the adequacy of the county road system. Dion v. Baker County, 70 Or LUBA 438 (2014).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence supports a finding that the value of proposed development outweighs the value of retaining rather than demolishing an historic structure, notwithstanding opponents' arguments that the city did not give weight to the architectural value of the structure, where the record indicates that the structure was designated only for its cultural, not architectural, significance. Rushing v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 448 (2014).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Under a historic demolition permit standard requiring a finding that the value of proposed development outweighs the value of retaining the historic resource, evidence that there are better sites in the city for the proposed development, a playground, is irrelevant to the question posed by the standard, which requires a comparison of the value of constructing the playground on the site against the value of retaining the historic resource. Rushing v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 448 (2014).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The city has discretion to rely on the evidence it chooses in making its decision, and the city's decision not to rely on evidence provided by an applicant that calculates slopes on a property using a method that differs from the method requested by the city is not a basis to reverse or remand the decision. SE Neighbors Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 51 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A petitioner's mere disagreement with a city's conclusion that, as conditioned, a commercial truck repair home occupation located in an accessory structure is secondary to residential use of the property does not establish that the city's conclusion is not supported by substantial evidence. Stevens v. City of Island City, 68 Or LUBA 112 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is no dispute that the applicant's traffic impact study was prepared by a licensed traffic engineer or that two existing intersections will need to be signalized to avoid having a proposed development significantly affect those intersections, the fact that the traffic impact study in the record is a draft of the final traffic impact study, which lacks the stamp of the engineer and the warrants that justified the two traffic signals, does not mean the draft traffic impact study is not substantial evidence. Lowery v. City of Portland, 68 Or LUBA 339 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The technical support for level of service figures in a traffic impact study (TIS) is a critical part of the TIC and the fact that the draft TIS does not include that technical support in the TIS appendix might require remand so that the final TIS with the technical support appendix could be added to the record. However, where no issue was raised before the local government concerning the missing technical support appendix, the issue is waived. Lowery v. City of Portland, 68 Or LUBA 339 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings official's expressions of misgivings about the quality of evidence submitted by an applicant do not mean the hearings officer required the applicant to meet an impermissible "absolute certainty" burden of proof. Teen Challenge v. Lane County, 67 Or LUBA 300 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A governing body errs in relying upon the personal knowledge of its members who are farmers to resolve a disputed issue regarding whether proposed disturbances to topsoil would render the subject property unfit for future agricultural use. The effect of topsoil disturbance on agricultural productivity is an arcane subject, and even if the farmer/commissioners have expert personal knowledge of that subject, it is inappropriate to approve or deny an application based on the decision-makers' personal knowledge of disputed facts rather than on the evidence submitted during the evidentiary proceeding. Hood River Valley PRD v. Hood River County, 67 Or LUBA 314 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's decision that it has the required majority of consents to annex an area is supported by substantial evidence, where the contract consents have been executed and recorded and there is nothing on the face of the documents that calls their validity into question. Not-yet-litigated contentions of the consenting landowners that the contract consents are invalid because they were obtained through coercion or that the contract consents have been revoked do not so undermine the contract consents that they can no longer be viewed as substantial evidence. Roads End Water District v. City of Lincoln City, 67 Or LUBA 452 (2013).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA will affirm a city decision that an applicant's methodology for estimating trip generation from a proposed discount superstore is consistent with the guidelines set out in an applicable traffic generation manual, where nothing in the manual requires that another method be used where no similarly situated store is located in the city, or calls into question the extrapolation method that the traffic engineer used. Neighbors for Dallas v. City of Dallas, 66 Or LUBA 36 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Given the subjectivity of a criterion requiring that the proposed comprehensive plan map amendment be "in the public interest with regard to neighborhood or community concerns," a reasonable person could rely on the testimony of industrial businesses adjacent to the property that a proposed mixed-use apartment building located along a heavily used truck route could create conflicts between the residents and truck traffic to support a finding of that the proposed change is not in the public interest. Vest v. City of Molalla, 66 Or LUBA 155 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city decision maker may reasonably dismiss as not believable petitioner's non-expert testimony that proposed residential development could have a variety of negative environmental effects. Rosenzweig v. City of McMinnville, 66 Or LUBA 164 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence in the record supports a city's finding that a proposed cell tower location is the only feasible location where the evidence demonstrates that (1) alternative sites are located outside of the search area identified by applicant for meeting its coverage objectives, (2) the tower cannot reasonably be located within a right-of-way because there is not sufficient area within the right-of-way to locate all of the necessary equipment, (3) co-location is not feasible because the heights of existing towers are inadequate, and (4) co-location on an existing rooftop facility is not feasible due to inadequate structural integrity of the rooftop. Hill v. City of Portland, 66 Or LUBA 250 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Uncontradicted evidence that a legislative text amendment allowing for the expansion of existing landfills would not affect the county's transportation facilities, because traffic generated by landfill expansion is not a net increase but simply replaces traffic generated by portions of the existing landfill that are at capacity and will be closed, is sufficient to demonstrate that the text amendment does not "significantly affect" any transportation facility within the meaning of the Transportation Planning Rule at OAR 660-012-0060(1). Waste Not of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 65 Or LUBA 142 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could conclude, based on evidence that commercial farms near existing landfills are viable agricultural operations, that a text amendment allowing existing landfills to expand their geographic scope will not have additional impacts on nearby farm uses, and is consistent with a comprehensive plan policy providing that proposed rural development shall not substantially conflict with farm and forest uses. Waste Not of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 65 Or LUBA 142 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's decision that it is feasible for a proposed kennel operation to comply with DEQ's applicable noise standard is not supported by substantial evidence in the record, where an engineer's report concludes that noise from dogs barking in the outdoor kennel play area could exceed the DEQ hourly noise level limits on the property directly to the east and there is nothing in the record that rebuts that conclusion. Butcher v. Washington County, 65 Or LUBA 263 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that an 8.5-acre parcel with Class VI agricultural soils is not "suitable for grazing," and not "other lands" suitable for farm use, and hence not "agricultural land" as defined in OAR 660-033-0020, is supported by substantial evidence, where the undisputed evidence is that the parcel can accommodate only two animal units per month, equivalent to a lease value of $30 per month, yielding less revenue than the annual property taxes. O'Brien v. Lincoln County, 65 Or LUBA 286 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Arguments that a proposed system for controlling odor and leachate will not in fact control odor and leachate generated by the proposed use are insufficient to demonstrate that the decision is not supported by substantial evidence where nothing in the record calls into question the efficacy of the proposed odor and leachate system. Cottonwood Capital Property Mgmt. LLC v. City of Portland, 65 Or LUBA 370 (2012).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Geotechnical reports, a storm water design report and a staff report amount to substantial evidence in the record to support the city's conclusion that a proposed stormwater drainage plan "fit[s] the topography, soil, geology, and hydrology of hillsides and * * * ensure[s] hillside stability both during and after development. Boucot v. City of Corvallis, 64 Or LUBA 131 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Maps based on a city's GIS database that do not differ in any material respect from the city's Goal 5 map and are not a smaller scale than the city's adopted Goal 5 map provide substantial evidence regarding the location of wetland boundaries. Willamette Oaks LLC v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 328 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an authorization to an applicant to apply on a city's and county's behalf for land use approval to construct improvements on city and county owned property includes a statement at the beginning that the person or persons executing it has the authority to do so, a reasonable decision maker could conclude that the persons signing the authorization had the authority to provide the authorizations, where there is no evidence in the record indicating that the persons who issued the authorizations did not have that authority. Willamette Oaks LLC v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 328 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city does not err in relying upon an authoritative trip generation manual to estimate the number of new trips generated by a proposed use, instead of conducting actual traffic counts, where the petitioner cites no authority requiring the city to conduct actual traffic counts, nor suggests any way for the city to do so with respect to new development. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 64 Or LUBA 351 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that the record reflects that the proposed development will generate 18 trips per day is not supported by substantial evidence, where nothing in the record indicates that the development will generate 18 trips per day except the finding itself and earlier proposed versions of that finding in a staff report. A finding or proposed finding is not evidence. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 64 Or LUBA 377 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that public facilities are adequate to accommodate the proposed conditional use, based on review of statements from the public works department and fire chief, is not supported by substantial evidence, where the record includes no statements from the public works department, and the fire chief's letter states that it is unknown whether the city water supply can accommodate the proposed use. Poe v. City of Warrenton, 64 Or LUBA 377 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a permit extension criterion requires a local government to find that the permit applicant was not responsible for its failure to complete the development authorized by the permit within the term of the permit, a local government errs in finding that its determination concerning whether the applicant was responsible for that failure need not be supported substantial evidence. And while an applicant's claim that it could not have completed development within the term of the term of the original permit due to a historic downturn in the economy might be substantial evidence if that is the only evidence in the record, that unsubstantiated claim is not substantial evidence if there is other evidence that the applicant was seeking an alternate development proposal during the term of the original permit. Bard v. Lane County, 63 Or LUBA 1 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the county's initial 2006 decision relies upon a traffic study to demonstrate compliance with the Transportation Planning Rule (TPR) at OAR 660-012-0060(1)(c), and the decision is remanded but the county takes no action on remand until 2010, the county need not require that the traffic study be updated to reflect current 2010 traffic conditions. The focus of OAR 660-012-0060(1)(c) is on the end of the planning period, based on projected traffic growth from a base condition, and for purposes of the rule it does not matter whether growth is projected from 2006 or 2010. Setniker v. Polk County, 63 Or LUBA 38 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a decision maker is required to conduct a de novo review of the evidence in the record, but the decision maker erroneously believes that under the appropriate standard of review the decision maker is obligated to resolve all evidentiary conflicts in the applicant's favor absent overwhelming conflicting evidence, a decision based on that erroneous understanding would likely not constitute de novo review. Citizens Against LNG v. Coos County, 63 Or LUBA 162 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding expressing an erroneous understanding of the local decision-maker's standard of evidentiary review is harmless error at best, where no party identifies any findings addressing the approval criteria or evidence in which the decision-maker applied that erroneous standard of review. Citizens Against LNG v. Coos County, 63 Or LUBA 162 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Well reports generated when wells were dug decades ago are substantial evidence that a reasonable decision maker could rely upon to conclude that the wells can supply sufficient water for a proposed destination resort, where there is no countervailing evidence in the record, and the county addresses the possibility that the well reports are no longer accurate by imposing a condition requiring prior to final master plan approval that the applicant conduct pump tests and, if necessary, dig new wells, to ensure sufficient water. Oregon Coast Alliance v. Curry County, 63 Or LUBA 324 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Opinions given by members of a local decision-making body during deliberations do not constitute new evidence that the public has a right to respond to. Siegert v. Crook County, 63 Or LUBA 379 (2011).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could conclude from the plat of a neighboring subdivision showing a spur road ending in turnaround bordering the common property line with the proposed subdivision, and a notation that the roads are intended to "benefit this plat," that the spur road is not intended to be a connecting road between the two subdivisions. Burness v. Douglas County, 62 Or LUBA 182 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government decision that determines that an entire property is located on a foredune and denies an application for a dwelling based on that determination will be remanded where the findings do not explain why the local government reached the conclusion it reached and the conclusion is not supported by any evidence in the record identified by the local government. Rudell v. City of Bandon, 62 Or LUBA 279 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. DLCD's Goal 14 rule was amended in 2007 to require that the coordinated population projections required by ORS 195.025 and 195.036 must be "developed using commonly accepted practices and standards for population forecasting" and "based on current, reliable and objective sources and verifiable factual information, such as the most recent long-range forecast for the county published by the Oregon Office of Economic Analysis (OEA). OAR 660-024-0030. A county may not simply rely on county population projections that were found to be valid when they were adopted in 1998 to adopt updated population projections in 2009. While the county is not required to use the OEA long range forecast, it must conduct a review of its 1998 assumptions to determine whether they remain reliable in light of actual population growth and the OEA forecast. Meyer v. Douglas County, 61 Or LUBA 412 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. DLCD's Goal 14 rule was amended in 2007 to require that the coordinated population projections required by ORS 195.025 and 195.036 must be "developed using commonly accepted practices and standards for population forecasting" and "based on current, reliable and objective sources and verifiable factual information, such as the most recent long-range forecast for the county published by the Oregon Office of Economic Analysis (OEA)." OAR 660-024-0030. If in adopting a coordinated population projection under ORS 195.025 and 195.036 a county relies on a city's undocumented preference for a particular growth rate, the county forecast is not supported by an adequate factual base. Meyer v. Douglas County, 61 Or LUBA 412 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. DLCD's Goal 14 rule was amended in 2007 to require that the coordinated population projections required by ORS 195.025 and 195.036 must be "developed using commonly accepted practices and standards for population forecasting" and "based on current, reliable and objective sources and verifiable factual information, such as the most recent long-range forecast for the county published by the Oregon Office of Economic Analysis (OEA)." OAR 660-024-0030. A county decision to apply its assumed population growth rate for unincorporated areas of the county to the unincorporated areas of the county located inside urban growth boundaries is not supported by an adequate factual base where there is no explanation for why that assumption is reasonable for urban areas around cities that project a much lower population growth rate. Meyer v. Douglas County, 61 Or LUBA 412 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Even though the county relied on an erroneous calculation of potential mortgage carrying costs associated with attempting to farm the property, because even without the losses from mortgage costs, evidence in the record indicates that the property could not be profitably farmed, the county did not err in finding that the property could not be profitably farmed. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 60 Or LUBA 131 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's decision that a partition complies with common green recommended "width" standards is supported by substantial evidence when the width of the common green, as located and measured by the city, is within the recommended width. Meade v. City of Portland, 60 Or LUBA 265 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government's findings that an application for subdivision approval should be denied for failure to include a traffic study are inadequate, where there is no evidence that any of the circumstances that might require a traffic study under the local code were present and there was no suggestion during the local proceedings that planning staff believed a traffic study was necessary. Montgomery v. City of Dunes City, 60 Or LUBA 274 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. When an approval criterion requires that there be adequate water to serve the proposed use, it is not enough to demonstrate that there are sources of water available to the property. The amount of water needed to serve the proposed use must also be estimated. Crocker v. Jefferson County, 60 Or LUBA 317 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a small scale estuarine management unit map is ambiguous, even if the evidence in the record established that a tax lot was being mined in 1981 when estuary management unit designations were applied to the property, that would not conclusively establish an intent to place the tax lot in an estuary management unit that allows mining, as opposed to a management unit that does not allow mining, when the small scale map was adopted in 1981. However, such evidence would likely constitute substantial evidence of an intent to place the tax lot into an estuary management unit that allows mining, when the map was adopted in 1981. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Curry County, 60 Or LUBA 415 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Comprehensive plan maps that are not tax lot specific and post-1981 aerial photographs are not substantial evidence that a small tax lot was being mined in 1981 when the comprehensive plan was first adopted. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Curry County, 60 Or LUBA 415 (2010).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An applicant for approval of a cell tower may rely on letters from a school district director of communications and facilities and a special district property manager to establish that school district and special district property is not available as a site for a proposed cell tower. The applicant need not inquire beyond the districts' professional staff or contact the governing boards of the school district and special district. McLaughlin v. City of Springfield, 59 Or LUBA 275 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Post-enactment statements by the Metro Council President and a Metro planner that when 308 acres were added to the urban growth boundary and designated for Industrial use Metro only expected that 120 of those acres would actually be put to industrial use are not substantial evidence of that expectation, where neither the Metro Council President nor the planner make any reference to the ordinances that added the property to the urban growth boundary or any attempt to explain how the 120-acre figure was computed. Graser-Lindsey v. City of Oregon City, 59 Or LUBA 388 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where Metro has designated 308 acres next to a city for industrial development, a market analysis is not substantial evidence that those 308 acres are not needed to meet the 20-year regional need for industrial land, where that market analysis concludes that under the right economic conditions only 150 acres of 308 acres will be developed but also concludes that there is a current shortage of industrial land to meet the region's 20-year need for industrial land. Graser-Lindsey v. City of Oregon City, 59 Or LUBA 388 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In applying a destination resort approval standard that requires that destination resorts employ mitigation measures to ensure "no net loss of wildlife," a county may allow an applicant to utilize data developed in approval of a nearby destination resort that utilized seven indicator species to estimate the nature and extent of the damage that must be fully mitigated. A reasonable person would rely on such data unless opposing data is submitted to show the analysis that relies on indicator species missed or inadequately addressed some aspect of the wildlife resource. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Arguments that a basis of value report that was prepared to support an application to vacate right-of-way does not constitute substantial evidence—because the basis of value report is not an appraisal and was not prepared by a person who is licensed to prepare commercial real estate appraisals—are not sufficient to show the challenged decision is not supported by substantial evidence, where the city standard that requires a determination of the special benefit that will result from the requested vacation does not require an appraisal or require that the person who supplies that estimate be a licensed commercial real estate appraiser. Bowers v. City of Eugene, 58 Or LUBA 51 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county does not err in relying on a 2007 soil study to conclude that a parcel is not agricultural land under Goal 3, notwithstanding the absence in the record of a 2001 soil study that the applicant's consultant cites, where the 2007 study is intended to stand on its own and petitioners do not identify any critical information missing from the 2007 study that might be found in the 2001 study. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 58 Or LUBA 101 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence does not support a city's finding that constructing a new elementary school on a parcel 10 miles from the original urban renewal area will benefit or serve that original urban renewal area, where there is no evidence that the school would serve any current or displaced residents of the renewal area. Friends of Urban Renewal v. City of Portland, 58 Or LUBA 148 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county does not err in concluding that, as conditioned, a personal use airport will not "significantly" impact a neighboring equine facility, where the only adverse impact identified by the facility owner is that guests are advised to delay mounting or dismounting horses until after planes land or take-off, and conditions of approval limit operations to 20 flights per month. Johnson v. Marion County, 58 Or LUBA 459 (2009).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could infer from photographs that show the front and two sides of a dwelling that the pictured dwelling has "intact exterior walls and roof structure," as required by ORS 215.283(1)(s)(A) for approval of a replacement dwelling in an exclusive farm use zone. Hegele v. Crook County, 56 Or LUBA 156 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the evidence shows that a house had a kitchen sink, toilet and bathing facilities that were connected to a pipe that exited the house and traveled underground to a holding and disposal tank of some sort, that evidence is sufficient to establish that the dwelling had indoor plumbing that was connected to "a sanitary waste disposal system," as required by ORS 215.283(1)(s)(B) for approval of a replacement dwelling in an exclusive farm use zone. ORS 215.283(1)(s)(B) does not require that the applicant establish that the required "sanitary waste disposal system" qualifies as a "subsurface sewage disposal system," as defined by ORS 454.605(13). Hegele v. Crook County, 56 Or LUBA 156 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA will affirm a county's finding that fire protection measures that typically apply to logging operations are sufficient to ensure that a proposed mining operation in a forest zone will not significantly increase fire hazards, notwithstanding that a permanent mining operation will have greater duration and intensity than a seasonal logging operation, where the petitioners cite to no evidence substantiating their assertion that the nature and intensity of the mining operation require more stringent fire protection measures than logging operations. Comden v. Coos County, 56 Or LUBA 214 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A conclusion that the 374-foot elevation corresponds to the top of high bank, characterized by "an abrupt or noticeable change from a steeper grade to a less steep grade," is not supported by substantial evidence, where evidence in the record indicates that the 374-foot elevation is one point on a barely perceptible slope with no perceptible change in grade. The Piculell Group v. City of Eugene, 56 Or LUBA 298 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicant seeking to establish that a proposed mining site qualifies as a significant aggregate resource site does not argue to the county that opponents' data from off-site wells is consistent with data from the applicant's on-site wells or that the data from the off-site wells is unreliable because it was not collected under the supervision of a geologist, it is not unreasonable for the county to rely on the opponents' evidence to conclude that the two on-site borings were not sufficient to establish that a 117-acre mining site qualifies as a significant aggregate resource site. Westside Rock v. Clackamas County, 56 Or LUBA 601 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where two 25-foot test pits show an aggregate layer that is at least 20 feet deep and shows no sign of diminishing and the decision maker does not seem to have appreciated that the test pits were consistent with the first 25 feet of two deep borings located elsewhere on the site that showed an aggregate layer of far more than the 25-foot width required to qualify as a significant aggregate resource site under OAR 660-023-0180(3)(d)(B)(ii), remand is required so that the county can make it clearer that it understood the significance of the two 25-foot test pits. Westside Rock v. Clackamas County, 56 Or LUBA 601 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that rural residential development will have "minimal impact" on wildlife habitat is not supported by substantial evidence, where the only evidence relied upon is a study that addressed a different proposal under which one-fifth of the property would have been placed in a conservation easement, and the county fails to impose or require such a condition or easement, or explain why the proposed development satisfies the minimal impact standard without such a condition. Lofgren v. Jackson County, 55 Or LUBA 126 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city finding that the "top of the bank" is located entirely within 50 horizontal feet of the high water line is not supported by substantial evidence, where the applicant submitted a survey showing that at two points the top of the bank is further than 50 horizontal feet, and the city cites no specific evidence to the contrary. Kingsley v. City of Portland, 55 Or LUBA 256 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A planning staff report that takes the position that a proposed development is not in a fire hazard area can constitute substantial evidence that the development is not located in a fire hazard area, where the position in the planning staff report is unchallenged. Pete's Mtn. Home Owners Assoc. v. Clackamas County, 55 Or LUBA 287 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's conclusion that a fence between a public park and grazing land is sufficient to ensure compliance with ORS 215.296(1) is supported by substantial evidence, notwithstanding the possibility that dogs may exit the park through an unfenced boundary and travel across intervening parcels to harass cattle, where there are no reported incidents of trespass across the unfenced boundaries and only speculation to support the possibility. Rural Thurston Inc. v. Lane County, 55 Or LUBA 382 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Remand is necessary where the city concludes based on petitioner's traffic impact analysis that proposed development will cause intersection performance to fall below the minimum standard, but the city misconstrues the analysis, which indicates that the proposed development will not cause the intersection to fall below the minimum performance standard. Vista Construction LLC v. City of Grants Pass, 55 Or LUBA 590 (2008).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An applicant's experience as a geologist does not necessarily qualify her to testify as an expert on the feasibility of constructing driveway access that complies with maximum finished grade requirements. Lenox v. Jackson County, 54 Or LUBA 272 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. That a conditional use permit application is deemed complete under ORS 227.178 does not necessarily mean that the application is supported by substantial evidence that demonstrates compliance with all applicable approval criteria. Caster v. City of Silverton, 54 Or LUBA 441 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A two-year old traffic study determining that the local transportation system will continue to operate within acceptable limits after full build-out of property in the area is substantial evidence that a particular proposed commercial use will not impose an undue burden on the transportation system, where there is evidence that the assumptions that the study was based upon are still valid. Western Express v. Umatilla County, 54 Or LUBA 571 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's finding that land is not suitable for grazing is not supported by substantial evidence, where the land has a history of grazing, and is bordered by similarly sized parcels currently used for grazing that have the same soils and conditions. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 54 Or LUBA 678 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An adjoining farmer's testimony that a parcel need not remain in farm zoning to allow their farm operations to continue, combined with the absence of any history of combined farm use, is substantial evidence supporting a county's finding that the parcel is not "agricultural land" under the OAR 660-033-0020(1)(a)(C) definition. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 54 Or LUBA 678 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could rely on evidence that there are 25 on-street parking spaces in the area that are only partially occupied during peak hours, to conclude that parking in the area is adequate, and thus that a variance to off-street parking requirements will not be "materially detrimental" to the purpose of the off-street parking requirement. Grant v. City of Depoe Bay, 53 Or LUBA 214 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A substantial evidence challenge may not be based on evidence that is not in the local record and was not before the final decision maker. Lissner v. Washington County, 53 Or LUBA 357 (2007).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's conclusion that the property is not suitable for commercial forest uses is supported by substantial evidence where the property owner prepared a study of the forestland productivity of the subject property, which was reviewed by a forester from the Department of Forestry (DOF), that indicated that the property is capable of producing only 1.8 cubic feet per acre per year of wood fiber, and the record includes letters from the DOF stating that any attempts to produce commercial stands on the property would be futile. Hecker v. Lane County, 52 Or LUBA 91 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Because ORS 215.422(1)(c) explicitly limits the appeal fee that counties can charge for certain land use appeals, evidence that total annual revenues produced by over 200 county fees fall short of total planning department annual expenses is not sufficient to demonstrate that the fees collected for three types of appeals comply with ORS 215.422(1)(c). A more particularized evidentiary effort to focus on the costs and expenses associated with the three types of appeals subject to ORS 215.422(1)(c) is required. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 52 Or LUBA 140 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the record reflects that 10 acres of irrigation rights were removed from two 20-acre parcels because irrigating with that water was extremely inefficient, (2) the nonfarm parcels consist of 85 percent bare ground, and (3) moving the irrigation rights back would provide no benefit, county's findings that returning irrigation rights to the property would not render the nonfarm parcels generally suitable for the production of farm crops or livestock is supported by substantial evidence. Peterson v. Crook County, 52 Or LUBA 160 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Under substantial evidence review, petitioners must do more than identify conflicting evidence the local government could have relied upon; they must explain why it was unreasonable for the local government to make the challenged the decision. Burlison v. Marion County, 52 Or LUBA 216 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Under Armstrong v. Asten-Hill Co., 90 Or App 200, 752 P2d 312 (1988), the substantial evidence standard is not satisfied when "the credible evidence apparently weighs overwhelmingly in favor of one finding and the [decision maker] finds the other without giving a persuasive explanation." Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The party who puts forth the larger effort to produce evidence regarding a land use application is not necessarily entitled to prevail under a substantial evidence review solely by virtue of that larger effort. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The critical issue for the local decision maker will generally be whether any expert or lay testimony offered by permit opponents raises questions or issues that undermine or call into question the conclusions or supporting documentation that are presented by the applicant's experts and, if so, whether any such questions or issues are adequately rebutted by the applicant's experts. LUBA's role on review is to determine if a reasonable person would have answered those questions as the local decision maker did, in view of all of the evidence in the record. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local decision maker may assign some additional significance to the testimony of the city engineer or Oregon Department of Transportation engineers regarding transportation system impacts based on their neutrality regarding the merits of the development proposal itself. But that process of assigning any extra weight necessarily calls for a case by case determination by the local decision maker, with LUBA deferring to any such assignments of extra weight that are reasonable, based on the evidence in the whole record. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA frequently analyzes findings challenges and evidentiary challenges separately and generally analyzes findings challenges first, because LUBA's resolution of the findings challenge frequently affects its resolution of the evidentiary challenge or makes it unnecessary to decide the evidentiary challenge. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's finding that it is feasible to expand an existing stormwater facility without infringing on the neighboring petitioner's rights to the existing capacity of that facility, where there is no evidence that the expansion will affect the capacity of the existing pond, and the hearings officer imposed conditions sufficient to ensure that the expansion will not infringe on the existing capacity. Bollam v. Clackamas County, 52 Or LUBA 738 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government could reasonably accept as true an expert's testimony about the findings in a biological assessment, even though the biological assessment itself is not in the record. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 52 Or LUBA 325 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government's decision is supported by substantial evidence despite the fact that a wetlands delineation report and a biological assessment that were discussed during the local proceedings are not included in the record, where parts of the wetlands delineation report are quoted in the application and there is a great deal of other evidence in the record that the local government relied on. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 52 Or LUBA 325 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county hearings officer's identification of the "ordinary high water" line for purposes of determining a riparian setback area is supported by substantial evidence even though specific elevations were not identified on the property and then transferred to a map, where the planning staff and hearings officer conducted site visits to confirm the accuracy of the applicant's map indicating the location of the high water mark. Lovinger v. Lane County, 51 Or LUBA 29 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's determination that it is feasible for a proposed home occupation to comply with local code criteria prohibiting the creation of vibration, glare, fumes or odors detectable to normal sensory perception off the subject property with a condition relocating the parking area for diesel vehicles away from abutting properties and limiting idling time of diesel vehicles to 10 minutes is not supported by substantial evidence, where the evidence relied upon is a conclusory statement in a planning staff memorandum that fumes and odors could be eliminated by limiting idling time and providing a sufficient buffer. Watts v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 166 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government reasonably viewed an engineer as a qualified expert, where the person had a degree in agricultural engineering and several engineering certifications, participated actively in the local proceedings regarding a mineral and aggregate overlay and presented models to predict performance of mining plans, and challenged assumptions of the applicant's experts. Westside Rock v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 264 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's conclusion that a standard requiring that development not "seriously interfere" with sensitive riparian habitat is not met, notwithstanding that the only evidence on that point is the testimony of the applicant's consultant, where that testimony is based on an assertion that the proposed campground and parking areas "stay well clear" of sensitive riparian habitat, but the site plan clearly shows that the proposed campground and parking area are located adjacent to the riparian habitat. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An acoustic engineer's statement that the procedures followed in conducting a noise study for an aggregate mine were "generally consistent" with procedures required by state administrative rule is sufficient to demonstrate compliance with the rule, particularly where the petitioners do not identify any material difference between the procedures followed and those required the rule. Ray v. Josephine County, 51 Or LUBA 443 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's findings that chemicals are required in the future in order to make forest practices on a property practicable are not supported by substantial evidence where the record does not indicate whether chemicals were already applied to the property or that whatever applications might be necessary have not already occurred. Anderson v. Coos County, 51 Or LUBA 454 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's finding that aerial spraying of chemicals is necessary in order to make forest practices on a 20-acre property practicable is not supported by substantial evidence where the evidence in the record supports a conclusion that manual application is the preferred method of application for properties 40 acres or smaller and the findings do not provide other reasons that manual spraying is not practicable. Anderson v. Coos County, 51 Or LUBA 454 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In order to prevail on a substantial evidence challenge, a petitioner must identify the challenged findings and explain why a reasonable person could not reach the same conclusion based on all the evidence in the record. Stoloff v. City of Portland, 51 Or LUBA 560 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a development code requires that a city find that transportation facilities will be available prior to or at the time of development of annexed property, testimony by an applicant's traffic engineer and the city engineer that traffic facilities needed to serve annexed property will be available prior to or at the time of development is substantial evidence supporting a city's finding that the development code requirement is satisfied. Friends of Bull Mountain v. City of Tigard, 51 Or LUBA 759 (2006).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city finding that an existing residential zone may be amended in ways that will reduce the development potential of that zone because development in that zone has historically been at the high end of 5 to 10 units per acre density allowed in the zone is not supported by substantial evidence, where the only relevant evidence in the record shows that development has averaged 5.6 units per acre in that zone. 4-J Land Co., LLC v. City of Sandy, 50 Or LUBA 525 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer errs in approving a cul-de-sac under subdivision criteria that allow a cul-de-sac only where existing development on adjacent property prevents a street connection and a connected street pattern is not possible, where (1) the "existing development" is on the same property being subdivided, (2) there is evidence that a street connection is possible, and there are no findings explaining why a street connection is not possible. Paterson v. City of Bend, 49 Or LUBA 160 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's conclusion that a proposed nonfarm dwellings will not alter the stability of the land use pattern in the area is not supported by substantial evidence where that conclusion is based on an estimate that 4 or 5 additional nonfarm dwellings could be approved, and that estimate is not supported by any evidence in the record. Peterson v. Crook County, 49 Or LUBA 223 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Absent any contravening evidence or need for more detailed analysis, staff testimony that proposed application fee increases accurately reflect increased costs and are less than the maximum amount that cities may charge under ORS 227.175(1) is substantial evidence supporting a finding of compliance with the statute. Doty v. City of Bandon, 49 Or LUBA 411 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the decision maker adopts application fee increases but fails to recognize that doing so inadvertently increases local appeal fees, remand is necessary for the local government to take evidence and adopt findings demonstrating that the increased appeal fees are consistent with ORS 227.180(1). Doty v. City of Bandon, 49 Or LUBA 411 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. When the local record clearly shows and adequately describes the location of a proposed road project, a decision approving that project is supported by substantial evidence regarding the location of the proposed road even if the specific name for the project in the decision was not used in the local record. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. City of Dayton, 49 Or LUBA 622 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. That cattle grazing occurs at some level on large tracts of BLM land with the same Class VII soils and vegetative characteristics as the subject property is some evidence that the much smaller subject property could also support some level of grazing. However, that indirect evidence does not compel a conclusion that the property is suitable for grazing, given countervailing evidence that the property is not suitable for farm use under the factors considered in OAR 660-033-0020(1)(a)(B). Wood v. Crook County, 49 Or LUBA 682 (2005).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings official decision that a proposed chiropractic home occupation that would generate eight client trips per day does not constitute "excessive traffic" on a short, dead-end unimproved residential street that serves a relatively small number of existing residences is supported by substantial evidence. Revoal v. City of Eugene, 47 Or LUBA 136 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings that conclude access is available to an adjoining road, but do not explain how the road may be accessed, are not supported by substantial evidence where all of the evidence cited to LUBA indicates that access is not possible. Seaton v. Josephine County, 47 Or LUBA 178 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A code standard that requires preliminary staff approval of the location, design and capacity of a proposed subdivision sewage disposal system does not require independent determination of adequacy of the city's sewer facilities. Bauer v. City of Portland, 47 Or LUBA 459 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Testimony from a person who is unwilling to identify himself is suspect and absent any corroboration is not evidence a reasonable person would rely upon. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 101 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA will reject a challenge to the evidentiary support for a finding that mining traffic will significantly conflict with agricultural practices, within the meaning of OAR 660-023-0180(4)(b)(E), where there is evidence that (1) truck traffic from the mine will cause the level of service for vehicles entering and exiting a nearby farm stand to be reduced from LOS C to LOS D, (2) truck traffic will interfere with the use of the road for the transport of agricultural equipment, and the applicant has not demonstrated that those conflicts will be minimized. Eugene Sand and Gravel, Inc. v. Lane County, 46 Or LUBA 254 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's finding that aerial photographs neither established the existence nor non-existence of a road in 1992 is supported by substantial evidence where the road was primitive and only used intermittently over the years. Bonnett v. Deschutes County, 46 Or LUBA 318 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's decision that a road existed in 1992 is supported by substantial evidence where the record includes conflicting expert and lay testimony regarding the existence of the road in 1992 and the road need not have been improved to any particular standard and was the kind of primitive road that a reasonable person might or might not have recognized as a road. Bonnett v. Deschutes County, 46 Or LUBA 318 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An arborist's and professional engineer's testimony is not substantial evidence that it is impracticable to save two groves of mature trees in constructing a discount superstore and parking, where the arborist and professional engineer do not consider the practicability of reducing the building footprint or the area of the site that will be developed with parking. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Hillsboro, 46 Or LUBA 680 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Expert testimony that is not in the record and that appears only as reported by the applicant to staff is not sufficient to establish the capacity of the subject property for farm and forest uses. Friends of Douglas County v. Douglas County, 46 Or LUBA 757 (2004).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government does not misconstrue a local ordinance requiring permanent legal access to a parcel by relying on easements entered into by prior landowners with government agencies providing reciprocal rights for access. Sisters Forest Planning Comm. v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 145 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is evidence that the subject property was separated from a larger parcel by virtue of a 1976 conveyance of an intervening parcel, a county's conclusion that the subject property was also created in 1976 is supported by substantial evidence. Frazee v. Jackson County, 45 Or LUBA 263 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Testimony by the city administrator that anticipated local appeal costs are likely to be similar to the cost of appeals from the city to LUBA is substantial evidence supporting imposition of a $500 local appeal fee, for purposes of establishing that the fee is not more than the average or actual cost of such appeals under ORS 227.180(1)(c), in the absence of contradictory evidence. Friends of Linn County, 45 Or LUBA 408 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where county code requires that "all owners" sign a subdivision application, a conclusion that that standard is met is supported by substantial evidence where the record includes a certificate signed by the applicant certifying that the applicant owns the property and other documents in the record name the applicant as the grantee or as a representative of the owner. Neketin v. Washington County, 45 Or LUBA 495 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A decision verifying the scope and intensity of a nonconforming racetrack operation is not supported by substantial evidence, where no party identifies supporting evidence in the record, and the decision's recitation of facts indicates that the use as verified exceeds the scope and intensity of the racetrack on the date it became nonconforming in at least some particulars. Leach v. Lane County, 45 Or LUBA 580 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. LUBA will not remand a county decision for failing to include a sample of light-green visqueen to support a finding that the material is nonreflective, where the challenged decision is not based on such a finding. Lorenz v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 635 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The lack of specific evidence on whether aggregate samples tested by a laboratory were "representative," as required by OAR 660-023-0180(3)(a), does not provide a basis for reversal or remand, where the samples came from an existing quarry and there is no suggestion in the record that the sample was not representative or that the quality of rock in the existing quarry was not uniform. Bryant v. Umatilla County, 45 Or LUBA 653 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the evidence concerning whether a dwelling had been abandoned or interrupted before 1995 is conflicting and the hearings officer relies heavily on photographs of the dwelling that he mistakenly believed were taken in 1995 rather than years later to conclude that use of the dwelling use was abandoned or interrupted for more than one-year before 1995, the hearings officer's decision is not supported by substantial evidence and must be remanded so that the hearings officer can render a decision with a correct understanding of the date the photographs were taken. Bradley v. Washington County, 44 Or LUBA 36 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's finding that buried concrete reservoirs will not cause "significant detrimental impact" to the environment is supported by substantial evidence, where the city's code defines that term to mean development that disrupts or destroys ecological systems, and evidence in the record shows that the surface over the buried reservoirs will be restored and replanted and the reservoirs will not significantly affect underground hydrology. Bauer v. City of Portland, 44 Or LUBA 210 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Petitioner's evidentiary challenge to a city's conclusion that an applicable criterion is satisfied provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the challenge is based on petitioner's interpretation of what the criterion requires, and that interpretation was not presented during the local proceedings. Slepack v. City of Manzanita, 44 Or LUBA 301 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a decision approving a subdivision that finds it is infeasible to extend a road from the proposed subdivision to an adjoining property and a petitioner at LUBA argues that the finding is not supported by substantial evidence, LUBA will remand where the respondent cites no evidence that supports the finding. McFall v. City of Sherwood, 44 Or LUBA 493 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that an EFU parcel would contribute no productive farm acreage to any neighboring farm, and thus is generally unsuitable for farm use even if used in conjunction with neighboring dairy farms, is not supported by substantial evidence, where two neighboring dairy farmers offered to buy the parcel to use in conjunction with their farms. A property's usefulness as farmland, considered on its own, is not necessarily indicative of its usefulness when combined with an existing farm or ranch. Ploeg v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 4 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county decision establishing a one-half-mile radius impact area around proposed dwellings within a Goal 5 wildlife habitat area is supported by substantial evidence, where the county relies on studies that human impacts extend one-half mile from dwellings and elk prefer to be at least one-half mile from humans. Doty v. Jackson County, 43 Or LUBA 34 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Evidence that a livestock operation is conducted on a parcel for part of the year is sufficient to establish that the property contains an "existing" livestock operation, for purposes of the requirements for siting a guest ranch on EFU-zoned land, where the record shows that rotation of cattle from the property during the wet months, to allow pasture to rest, is a matter of good animal husbandry. Durdan v. Deschutes County, 43 Or LUBA 248 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In determining that an applicant failed to carry his burden to demonstrate that a proposed home occupation would be carried out inside a building and in a manner that would not unreasonably interfere with other uses, the county did not err by considering existing and past conditions on the property. Hick v. Marion County, 43 Or LUBA 483 (2003).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A memorandum explaining why one tax lot is not a feasible alternative to siting a radio transmission tower on EFU-zoned land and also addressing criticisms of an earlier memorandum explaining why another tax lot is infeasible is evidence a reasonable person could rely on to conclude that the second tax lot is not a feasible alternative. Van Nalts v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 497 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In granting design approval for a highway interchange improvement project originally proposed as part of a larger project, a decision maker is not required to study and address interim impacts to existing facilities covered by the larger project other than the interchange, and the decision maker's failure to do so does not leave the evidence supporting approval of the interchange project something other than substantial evidence. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A decision that analyzes numerous aspects of a proposed alteration of a nonconforming use compared to the historic use of the property is sufficient to establish the scope and nature of the nonconforming use where the petitioner does not challenge that analysis. Ankarberg v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 504 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A prior local government decision that a nonconforming use had not been discontinued may constitute substantial evidence in support of a subsequent land use decision that, as of the date of the prior decision, the nonconforming use had not been discontinued. Ankarberg v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 504 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Draft transportation and parking demand plans for a proposed school are substantial evidence supporting a finding of compliance with a "safe streets" approval standard, notwithstanding that the conditions of approval require that the school submit and city staff approve final plans in which the city might impose additional or different terms. Friends of Collins View v. City of Portland, 41 Or LUBA 261 (2002).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A planning staff report that advises the city council that a riparian vegetation plan had been reviewed and found to be adequate by the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife is substantial evidence in support of a finding that a proposal will not result in "adverse impact to the fish and wildlife resources in the area." Willhoft v. City of Gold Beach, 41 Or LUBA 130 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the city's comprehensive plan locates the boundary of a Goal 17 overlay zone at the "top edge" of the bluff overlooking the ocean, but nothing in the record supports the city's conclusion that proposed expansion of a dwelling built into the bluff will occur outside the overlay zone, remand is necessary for the city to identify the "top edge" of the bluff and the existing dwelling's location in relation to the zoning boundary. Crowley v. City of Bandon, 41 Or LUBA 87 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Conditions imposed to ensure that only de minimis traffic volumes from a proposed recycling facility impact nearby failing intersections during certain times are insufficient and unenforceable, where the county's decision fails to (1) define what de minimis traffic volumes are, (2) specify the times when the conditions apply, and (3) impose conditions or identify solutions that a reasonable person would find adequate to ensure that traffic associated with the facility uses a longer alternate route rather than the short direct route through failing intersections. K.B. Recycling, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 41 Or LUBA 29 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The assumptions underlying the county's revenue projections and its conclusion that an urban renewal plan is "feasible" under ORS 457.095(6) and 457.085(3)(g) must be supported by substantial evidence, i.e., evidence a reasonable person would rely upon. The local government need not demonstrate that projected new development is presently committed and certain to occur. Zimmerman v. Columbia County, 40 Or LUBA 483 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where nearly all the evidence in the record concerning potential groundwater pollution associated with a proposed aggregate mine is speculative and would support opposite conclusions concerning that potential, the local government's selection of which evidence to believe is reasonable. Donnell v. Union County, 40 Or LUBA 455 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An unsupported assurance by the applicant's attorney that the entire septic system necessary to support a proposed church expansion can be located on a church-owned parcel is not substantial evidence supporting a finding to that effect, where all the other evidence in the record regarding the feasibility of the septic system assumes that part of it will be located on an adjoining parcel. Weaver v. Linn County, 40 Or LUBA 203 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that property that is to be rezoned from residential to commercial can be adequately served by sewer and fire districts is supported by substantial evidence, where the record shows that nine months earlier the districts indicated in a prior proceeding concerning the property that such services could be provided. Swyter v. Clackamas County, 40 Or LUBA 166 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings that a proposed road width variance will not be materially detrimental to other property owners in the area are not supported by substantial evidence when they are based on a comparison to other substandard roads rather than the effect of the proposed variance itself. Georgeff v. Curry County, 40 Or LUBA 101 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Even though substantial evidence did not exist in a prior application to support a finding of need for additional seasonal farmworkers, additional evidence may be presented during a subsequent application to support a finding of need. Durig v. Washington County, 40 Or LUBA 1 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city governing body is not required to apply the Oregon Rules of Evidence in its land use proceedings and may rely on hearsay evidence in a planning staff report to reach a conclusion regarding representations that were made to a permit applicant. Reagan v. City of Oregon City, 39 Or LUBA 672 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's finding that a proposal will have no adverse effect on abutting property is not supported by substantial evidence when the decision does not address how all abutting property owners are affected. ODOT v. City of Klamath Falls, 39 Or LUBA 641 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a proposed aggregate extraction site must demonstrate compliance with a public need criterion and a criterion that requires consideration of alternative sites, but identified alternative sites are rejected without explanation and the only cited evidence regarding public need is testimony from the public works director that he would support a site anywhere in the county, the decision is not supported by adequate findings or substantial evidence. Donnell v. Union County, 39 Or LUBA 419 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government's determination that there is sufficient land designated multi-family residential to satisfy Goal 10 is supported by substantial evidence when the acknowledged Goal 10 housing inventory establishes that the city has a 238-acre surplus of land designated for multi-family development, and the proposal is to rezone only eight acres from multi-family residential to commercial. Craig Realty Group v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 384 (2001).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A planning staff report may constitute substantial evidence upon which a local government may rely, and a planning staff report may summarize applicable portions of professional manuals, such as the Institute of Transportation Engineers Trip Generation Guide. Chilla v. City of North Bend, 39 Or LUBA 121 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A planning administrator's "unique knowledge" of additional information that is not contained in the record is not substantial evidence upon which a local government may rely in reaching its decision. Hausam v. City of Salem, 39 Or LUBA 51 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Although items of evidence, when viewed individually, might be sufficiently questionable that they would not be relied upon by a reasonable decision maker, when viewed together those same items of evidence might become evidence a reasonable person could accept in support of a challenged finding. Rivera v. City of Bandon, 38 Or LUBA 736 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's finding that the portion of a dwelling exceeding a code-mandated height limit adversely affects the ocean view of a neighboring property is supported by substantial evidence where the record includes photographs, a videotape and drawings that show the subject dwelling blocking the view of ocean water from the neighboring property, notwithstanding that the photographs, videotape and drawings show that the subject dwelling blocks only a tiny sliver of ocean water view. Rivera v. City of Bandon, 38 Or LUBA 736 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person with an understanding of the assumptions and limitations that underlie USDA soils data would not rely on those data to conclude that sites rated to have severe soils limitations for small commercial uses for that reason alone cannot accommodate any commercial use. DLCD v. Douglas County, 38 Or LUBA 542 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an existing adult video store seeks a conditional use permit to remain open past the normal 10 p.m. closing time required in the zoning district, evidence that a police prostitution sting operation at a nearby 24-hour adult video store resulted in numerous arrests after 10 p.m. and testimony by a business neighbor of vandalism and criminal activity outside another 24-hour adult video store operated by the permit applicant is substantial evidence that granting the requested conditional use permit would result in an increase of criminal activity and thereby violate a conditional use "compatibility" and "livability" standard. Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Absent a condition requiring a holding tank of sufficient size, a reasonable decision maker could not conclude that a well producing 1,200 to 2,400 gallons per day is adequate to serve a rural use without adversely affecting neighboring wells, when there is undisputed evidence that the peak demands of the proposed use exceed the estimated well capacity. Spiro v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 133 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government's findings determining that traffic generated by a proposed development will be mitigated by certain conditions of approval is not supported by substantial evidence, where the government's decision does not limit the maximum developable area to that established as the basis for the traffic impact analysis. DLCD v. City of Warrenton, 37 Or LUBA 933 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where petitioner challenges the adequacy and evidentiary basis for a local government's decision determining that a proposed development "is or will be compatible" with the land use development pattern in the vicinity of the request, LUBA will analyze the findings to determine (1) whether the findings are adequate; (2) whether there is substantial evidence in the record to support a finding that, absent some conditions of approval, the compatibility standard is met; and (3) if conditions of approval are necessary to establish compatibility, whether the local government adopted such conditions. DLCD v. City of Warrenton, 37 Or LUBA 933 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county may reasonably rely on a report based on consideration of a broad sample of native tree species to determine whether the predominant soils on the property are capable of producing more than 49 cubic feet per acre per year of wood fiber of any kind where there is not reasonable basis presented for believing that planting one or more nonnative tree species on the predominate soils would produce more than 49 cubic feet per acre per year of wood fiber. Carlson v. Benton County, 37 Or LUBA 897 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a county prohibits the refiling of a new or substantially similar application until two years after a final decision denying an application; the decision maker determines that a second application, filed less than a year after the first, was "substantially similar" because it involved the same use on the same property and the changes in the facts supporting the application were otherwise insufficient to demonstrate that the application is different; and the decision maker points to evidence in the record to support his conclusions, that decision is supported by substantial evidence. Munn v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 621 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Evidence that industrial uses are occurring on industrially zoned property within two miles of the subject property is insufficient to demonstrate, as a matter of law, that a proposed excavation business located in a rural residential zone complies with a requirement that the use "will not interfere with existing uses on nearby land or with other used permitted in the zone in which the property is located." Munn v. Clackamas County, 37 Or LUBA 621 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the city council's review of a planning commission decision is limited to whether the lower decision is supported by substantial evidence, and petitioner argues that the city council exceeded its review authority by reweighing the evidence, LUBA will deny the assignment of error where it concludes that the city council understood and applied the substantial evidence standard correctly. Ontrack, Inc. v. City of Medford, 37 Or LUBA 472 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a hearings officer rejects a proposed stormwater control method as inadequate to ensure compliance with an approval criterion that requires reduction of flood flows below erosive capacity, but nonetheless finds compliance with the standard based on the hearings officer's unsupported opinion that more adequate methods are available, the finding of compliance is not supported by substantial evidence. Mitchell v. Washington County, 37 Or LUBA 452 (2000).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. When a city's decision to annex territory is also a land use decision, the city must be able to demonstrate that the annexation decision complies with the statutory annexation requirements and is supported by substantial evidence in the record. A failure to demonstrate such compliance requires a remand. Johnson v. City of La Grande, 37 Or LUBA 380 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A bill to the property owner for spraying and planting of trees is substantial evidence that the required spraying was done on the property, notwithstanding that the bill refers to a different property, where the property owner explains during the local hearing that the reference to a different property is an error and LUBA concludes a reasonable person could have accepted that explanation. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A property owner's explanation that required plowing and cultivation occurred at the time Christmas trees were planted is substantial evidence that required plowing and cultivation occurred, where the only contrary evidence is opponents' unsupported expressions of doubt that the required plowing and cultivation occurred. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local ordinance requiring feasible or adequate bicycle or pedestrian connections to adjacent and nearby planned unit developments is not met when the evidence fails to show where the bicycle and pedestrian connections are to be located, and the decision does not require the connections to be located in any particular place. Highland Condominium Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 37 Or LUBA 13 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's finding that it is feasible to comply with an approval standard requiring that public facilities can accommodate the proposed use is supported by substantial evidence, where the city conditions approval on the applicant making improvements to an intersection, including improvements that ODOT had imposed on a previous application for a more traffic-intensive use on the subject property. Terra v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 582 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence supports a city's rezoning of land from multi-family to single-family residential uses, where the city's inventory indicates a need for 1,081 multi-family dwellings, and a reasonable person could conclude that the number of existing and approved multi-family dwellings exceeds 1,081 units, notwithstanding flaws in the city's analysis that render the exact number of those dwellings uncertain. Herman v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 521 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's finding that a proposed college pedestrian/bicycle path meets applicable safety standards is supported by substantial evidence notwithstanding concerns raised about the efficacy of proposed safety measures, where there is evidence the college has not historically experienced the kinds of criminal activity opponents speculate may occur as a result of construction of the path. Baughman v. City of Portland, 36 Or LUBA 353 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's ultimate finding that constructing a parking lot that will add pedestrians to a pedestrian/bicycle path complies with bicycle safety criteria is supported by substantial evidence, notwithstanding the lack of evidence in the record concerning how the relative mix of pedestrians and bicyclists will be affected by the parking lot, where petitioners fail to challenge the city's separate finding that co-existence of bicycles and pedestrians is "expected" on pedestrian/bicycle paths. Baughman v. City of Portland, 36 Or LUBA 353 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A city's decision to rely on estimates of traffic impacts based solely on student enrollment is supported by substantial evidence, notwithstanding the failure to separately account for traffic impacts that might be associated with a 90,000-square-foot expansion of school facilities, where the facility expansion will not increase student enrollment and the city explained that the traffic impact projections based on student enrollment were very conservative and overstated the likely actual traffic impacts. Baughman v. City of Portland, 36 Or LUBA 353 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a city interprets its zoning ordinance as requiring that a "recycling center" have the "primary purpose" of extracting recyclables from a waste stream, but not requiring that any particular percentage of the waste stream will be recycled, the city's conclusion that a proposed facility is a "recycling center" is supported by substantial evidence, notwithstanding the absence of evidence quantifying the percentage of recyclables in the waste stream. Sequoia Park Condo. Assoc. v. City of Beaverton, 36 Or LUBA 317 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A hearings officer's findings which rely on the absence of business records and the testimony of a neighbor to conclude that a nonconforming use was discontinued are supported by substantial evidence, where the findings address the conflicting evidence submitted by the applicant and explain why that evidence did not establish the continued existence of the nonconforming use. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 36 Or LUBA 273 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the applicant bears the burden of demonstrating under a local provision that there is no reason to believe a potential hazard exists on the subject property, the absence of evidence regarding potential hazards on the property does not constitute substantial evidence of compliance with that provision. Jebousek v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 124 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence supports a city's denial of a subdivision application based on a standard prohibiting cul-de-sacs longer than 400 feet, when the preliminary plat shows a cul-de-sac 427 feet in length. The city is not obligated to approve an application that does not comply with approval standards even if the approval could be conditioned on submitting a final plat that shows compliance with the applicable criteria. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 35 Or LUBA 482 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. That findings of noncompliance with an approval criterion are not supported by substantial evidence is not a basis for reversal or remand, where petitioner fails to challenge other findings of noncompliance with that criterion that are an independent basis for denial. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 35 Or LUBA 482 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where subdivision approval criteria do not require that the city determine whether a particular access route would be the "primary" access route, the city's failure to adopt such a finding and a lack of substantial evidence that the particular access route would be the primary access route provides no basis for reversal or remand. Hunt v. City of Ashland, 35 Or LUBA 467 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that a proposed subdivision will be connected to the city's storm drainage system is not supported by substantial evidence, where the proposed drainage system stops short of the city's storm drainage system and a condition of approval requiring paved access to the subdivision is not adequate to ensure that the storm drainage connection will be constructed along with that paved access. Hunt v. City of Ashland, 35 Or LUBA 467 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The evidence supporting a decision denying a permit need not match the evidence supporting the permit application in a qualitative and quantitative sense. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 35 Or LUBA 421 (1999).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's improper reliance on poor past management practices in concluding a property is not suitable for commercial forest use provides no basis for reversal or remand, where there is other evidence in the record that a reasonable person could rely on to reach that conclusion. Dept. of Transportation v. Coos County, 35 Or LUBA 285 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a site plan depicting setbacks was before the county decision maker, and was inadvertently not submitted to LUBA, testimony discussing the measurements and setbacks depicted on the site plan is evidence that may support the county's s findings regarding setbacks, notwithstanding that the site plan is itself absent from the record. Thomas v. Wasco County, 35 Or LUBA 173 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A staff report constitutes substantial evidence, where petitioner does not challenge the explanation and calculations contained in the report. Rogue Valley Assoc. of Realtors v. City of Ashland, 35 Or LUBA 139 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A condition requiring a drainage plan for a towing facility is supported by substantial evidence notwithstanding the owner's claim that towed vehicles would be drained of fluids, where the record showed the city council questioned the owner's claim and it was not clear where the drained fluids would be stored. Williamson v. City of Arlington, 35 Or LUBA 90 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local government fails to find a proposal complies with a code requirement for two parking spaces per unit, the applicant's testimony that two parking spaces will be provided per unit is not evidence that clearly supports a finding of compliance with the parking requirement under ORS 197.835(11)(b). Deal v. City of Hermiston, 35 Or LUBA 16 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A decision maker may review certain types of land use permit applications more stringently than others, provided the higher burden of proof is not attributable to bias or some other legally impermissible reason. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Petitioner's disagreement with the reasons specified by a local government for rejecting the evidence he submitted in support of a land use application provides no basis for reversal or remand. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is no evidence that a property only functions as winter range between December 1 and March 31, the selection of that time period for a condition of approval is not supported by substantial evidence. It is not within generally accepted knowledge that property only functions as winter range between December 1 and March 31. Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government's unsupported inference that ranching operations are 2-3 miles distant from the proposed nonfarm dwelling, and its reliance on the absence of evidence on which the applicant bears the burden of proof, do not constitute substantial evidence supporting a finding that the nonfarm dwelling is compatible with farm uses. Wolverton v. Crook County, 34 Or LUBA 515 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a county finds that the subject property's soils constitute "high-value farmland" as that concept is defined by statute, but there is no evidence in the record that supports that ultimate conclusion, the decision must be remanded. Corp. of Presiding Bishop v. Klamath County, 34 Or LUBA 131 (1998).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A planning "staff report" may provide an "adequate factual base" to support a legislative land use decision. Buhler Ranch v. Wallowa County, 33 Or LUBA 594 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicable criterion requires that a dwelling have the "least impact" on adjoining lands and the applicant does not show the dwelling could not be located on alternative sites on the property that would have fewer impacts, the applicant fails to demonstrate compliance with the criterion as a matter of law. Evans v. Multnomah County, 33 Or LUBA 555 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where, on remand, an applicant modifies a site plan for a gas station and car wash so that only the location of the gas pumps is carried forward from the original site plan to the modified site plan, a reasonable person could not conclude that the two plans are substantially similar. A finding that the plans are substantially similar does not adequately address the code requirements that apply to a site plan. Sullivan v. City of Woodburn, 33 Or LUBA 356 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Unsupported statements and assurances that a proposed dwelling will comply with local roof height and pitch standards do not constitute substantial evidence. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 33 Or LUBA 225 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Petitioner cannot challenge a moratorium extension by asserting that the city lacked substantial evidence to justify the initial moratorium; the relevant question is whether the record includes substantial evidence to support the moratorium extension. Manning v. City of St. Paul, 33 Or LUBA 193 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In reviewing evidence, LUBA may not substitute its judgment for that of the local decision maker, but must consider and weigh all evidence in the record to determine if the local decision maker's conclusion is supported by substantial evidence. Tigard Sand and Gravel v. Clackamas County, 33 Or LUBA 124 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. To demonstrate a nonconforming use was not interrupted under ORS 215.130, the evidence must establish that the business was operational on an ongoing basis. Tigard Sand and Gravel v. Clackamas County, 33 Or LUBA 124 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Petitioners fail to establish that a reasonable person could not reach the county's conclusion, based upon the facts before it, where petitioners disagree with the county's evaluation of the evidence, and present arguments as to how the facts could support a contrary conclusion. Alliance for Responsible Land Use v. Deschutes County, 33 Or LUBA 12 (1997).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where petitioners challenge the county's reliance on a traffic impact study that is three years old, but petitioners do not point to evidence in the record that undermines the conclusions of that study, petitioners fail to establish that the county's decision is not based on substantial evidence. Richards-Kreitzberg v. Marion County, 32 Or LUBA 76 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a petitioner challenges percentages relied upon by the county in support of a finding, the petitioner must provide citations to the record where the data upon which it relies to calculate its own percentages can be found. Helvetia Community Assoc. v. Washington County, 31 Or LUBA 446 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. There is no general requirement that survey evidence supporting a consultant's calculation of area be included in the record; instead, LUBA must determine whether, considering all relevant evidence in the record, a reasonable person could rely on the consultant's calculations. Squires v. City of Portland, 31 Or LUBA 335 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In considering the substantiality of evidence supporting a Goal 3 reasons exception for realignment of a highway, LUBA must look at the evidence supporting the challenged decision for the entire four-mile stretch of highway and all the impacted properties, not just the evidence of effects on one of the properties. Schrock Farms, Inc. v. Linn County, 31 Or LUBA 57 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Petitioners' challenge of the reliability of an environmental impact statement (EIS) that was relied upon by the county in its decision is insufficient where the challenge is based solely on the age of the EIS, without identification of other evidence in the record which undermines the EIS.
Schrock Farms, Inc. v. Linn County, 31 Or LUBA 57 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A finding that water for a proposed dwelling will come from a neighbor's property is not supported by substantial evidence when it has not been shown that the water can be legally provided through the appropriate grant of water rights. Furler v. Curry County, 31 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A county's denial of petitioners' application for a temporary special care permit is supported by substantial evidence in the record where the hearings officer finds that alternative housing exists close enough to petitioners' residence to provide necessary special assistance, and petitioners presented no evidence indicating that alternative housing is not available. Lundy v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 377 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a local criterion requires that the county find a proposed use will not significantly reduce or impair significant wildlife, a finding that compliance with fencing specifications will "help the request comply" does not factually address or establish compliance with the criterion. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Evidence of resource preservation gathered on one property can be substantial evidence to support findings of resource preservation on adjacent properties. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 30 Or LUBA 135 (1995).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In performing an alternative sites analysis under Goal 14 and its own zoning ordinance, a city may not assume that the cost of a previously developed site within the city limits is excessive or that forecasted redevelopment expenses will be prohibitive. DLCD v. City of St. Helens, 29 Or LUBA 485 (1995).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An unsupported statement in an application is not evidence, and an estimate of a geologist as to resource quantity, made without reference to evidence of any kind, is not substantial evidence. Palmer v. Lane County, 29 Or LUBA 436 (1995).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person would not conclude that a code conditional use permit standard requiring a proposed development to be timely considering the adequacy of storm drainage systems is satisfied, where there is no evidence in the record concerning the existence or adequacy of storm drainage facilities to handle anticipated runoff from the proposed development. Burghardt v. City of Molalla, 29 Or LUBA 223 (1995).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. The mere existence of a survey or computer listing of a city's available industrial land, absent argument by petitioner that particular listed sites represent available, industrially designated sites in the vicinity of a proposed plan map amendment, does not refute other evidence relied on by the city to determine there are no suitable alternative sites within a reasonable area of a proposed plan map amendment. Salem Golf Club v. City of Salem, 28 Or LUBA 561 (1995).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings that the impacts of a proposed livestock sales facility will be reduced because the livestock to be sold will be purebred, as opposed to animals of mixed ancestry, lack evidentiary support where there is no evidence distinguishing the impacts of these types of livestock. Collins v. Klamath County, 28 Or LUBA 553 (1995).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Findings that an orchard's accepted farming practices have not been significantly affected by trespassing golf balls are supported by substantial evidence where the evidence shows no orchard employees have been hit by golf balls, tree buffers are effective in deflecting golf balls and petitioner's testimony was discredited by video tape of petitioner collecting golf balls on the golf course property. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 28 Or LUBA 362 (1994).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a finding that the gravel extraction rate at a proposed site will not change from historic rates is not supported by substantial evidence, and the finding appears to play a significant role in the local government's finding of compliance with a code "compatibility" requirement, the challenged decision approving a conditional use permit for a gravel operation is not supported by substantial evidence. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A lack of response from the county Road Master is not substantial evidence that a code provision requiring no undue impairment of traffic flow is met. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could not conclude that a proposed forest dwelling satisfies a "necessary for forest use" standard because the subject property is "quite remote," where the evidence in the record shows only that the subject property is five miles from an urban growth boundary and a 35 minute drive from a city. Furler v. Curry County, 27 Or LUBA 546 (1994).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Statewide Planning Goal 2 requires that planning decisions and actions have an adequate factual base, regardless of the legislative or quasi-judicial nature of the decision. The Goal 2 requirement for an adequate factual base is equivalent to the requirement for substantial evidence in the whole record. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. City of North Plains, 27 Or LUBA 372 (1994).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A determination that a nonconforming quarry occupied five acres at the time it became nonconforming is not supported by substantial evidence in the whole record where the only evidence cited by the parties as establishing the size of the quarry operation at the relevant time is an undated aerial photograph. Mazeski v. City of Mosier, 27 Or LUBA 100 (1994).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Testimony from an Oregon Department of Forestry (DOF) representative which suggests a proposed dwelling could be compatible with forest uses, but was clarified by the DOF representative to eliminate any suggestion of compatibility, is not evidence a reasonable decision maker would rely upon to establish a proposed nonforest dwelling is compatible with forest uses. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the record establishes only that a small portion of the subject parcel is unsuitable for forest uses, a reasonable person could not conclude the entire parcel is generally unsuitable for farm or forest uses. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Under ORS 197.830(13)(a), LUBA's review is limited to the record of the proceedings below. Statements in a local government comprehensive plan background and inventory document, that are not included in the record, cannot constitute substantial evidence in support of a challenged decision. Fleck v. Marion County, 25 Or LUBA 745 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where a reasonable decision maker could rely on information contained in a geotechnical report to determine there are engineering solutions available to solve identified landslide, drainage and other hazards associated with the subject property, the geotechnical report is substantial evidence to support the local government's determination that the proposal complies with relevant local code standards. Corbett/Terwilliger Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 601 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the governing body ratifies an act of another local government official in the challenged decision, that aspect of the challenged decision is itself substantial evidence that the local official possessed authority to accomplish the disputed act. Choban v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 572 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. An expression of belief that a local code standard imposing a specific decibel limitation will not be violated is not an adequate finding of compliance with that standard. Expressions by the applicant's attorney that noise generated by the proposed use will not be excessive or violate the standard are not substantial evidence that the standard will be met. Weuster v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 425 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A staff report can contain evidence to support a decision challenged at LUBA. Oregon Raptor Center v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 401 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government is free to disregard or give little weight to a party's allegations concerning the substance of a telephone conversation between that party and another person not present at the local hearing. Decuman v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 152 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Evidence in the local record that there are currently a certain number of approved mobile home subdivision lots within a local jurisdiction, is not undermined by a statement in the comprehensive plan that several years earlier, a different number of mobile home subdivision lots were approved, but had not been "finalized." Mannenbach v. City of Dallas, 25 Or LUBA 136 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the local decision maker determines the existence of a nonconforming personal use airport, but the evidence concerning the scope of that nonconforming use is nonspecific, LUBA will affirm the local decision maker's determination that the scope of the nonconforming use amounts to no more than one four-hour flight per year from such airport. Warner v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 82 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. In determining compliance with a local code standard that a proposed farm dwelling be on a parcel as large as the median commercial farm unit in the area, a local government may rely on evidence that farm operations on three adjoining parcels constitute one commercial farm operation for purposes of calculating the size of the median commercial farm unit in that area. Walker v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 6 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. There is substantial evidence to support a local government's determination that a parcel is in farm use, where the parcel is a pasture for livestock and poison oak is burned on the property to retain that pasture. Leabo v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 495 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Substantial evidence is evidence a reasonable person would accept as adequate to support a conclusion. Absent some indication that the information provided by a traffic count at a single location is an unreliable indicator of the daily traffic on a road, the traffic count is substantial evidence of the daily traffic on that road. Reeves v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 483 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. There is no statutory requirement that legislative decisions be supported by substantial evidence. Riverbend Landfill Company v. Yamhill County, 24 Or LUBA 466 (1993).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government determination that a proposed nonresource dwelling "does not materially alter the stability of the overall land use pattern of the area" is not supported by substantial evidence, where the parties cite no evidence in the record establishing the relevant area, the overall land use pattern of such area or the effect of the proposed dwelling on the stability of such land use pattern. Todd v. Columbia County, 24 Or LUBA 289 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is evidence in the local government record that the number of golf balls claimed to have landed in adjoining orchards is exaggerated, a decision approving a golf course and imposing a condition requiring the planting of trees to contain golf balls on-site and installation of a fence and screen to prevent golfers and golf balls from entering adjoining orchard property, is supported by substantial evidence. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 24 Or LUBA 271 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the aerial application of chemicals on an orchard adjoining a proposed golf course will be rendered more difficult, although possible, in that at least one aerial sprayer indicates he would be willing to spray the affected orchard, and the decision approving the golf course requires the operator to close the golf course to facilitate such spraying, there is substantial evidence in the record that the golf course will not force a significant change in or significantly increase the cost of aerial spraying of the adjoining orchard. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 24 Or LUBA 271 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A decision that a golf course will not significantly change or increase the cost of ground spraying of an adjoining orchard is supported by substantial evidence, where there is conflicting evidence concerning the magnitude of ground spraying drift expected to travel onto adjoining properties, and the decision imposes a condition requiring that the golf course operator provide monitors to prevent golfers from coming into contact with ground spray drift. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 24 Or LUBA 271 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where different reasonable conclusions could be drawn from the evidence in the record, the choice between the different reasonable conclusions belongs to the local government. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 98 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A local government determination that a proposed development can be built without placing new construction within 25 feet of the centerline of a designated water feature is supported by substantial evidence where site plans in the record indicate the centerline of the water feature and display an acceptable design for the development that does not impinge on the 25-foot boundary. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 24 Or LUBA 98 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is uncontradicted evidence that up to 70 percent of the waste material to be accepted at a proposed recycling facility will be recycled, and that some recycling facilities accept material that includes both solid waste that cannot be recycled as well as recyclable material, a local government's finding that the solid waste transfer component of the proposed facility is "customarily incidental" to the recycling component of the facility is supported by substantial evidence in the record. Linebarger v. City of The Dalles, 24 Or LUBA 91 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. A reasonable person could conclude that adequate water service can be provided to a proposed development, where the record contains evidence demonstrating that under a worst case scenario of high water demand and limited availability of water from existing water rights, sufficient water can be provided if a certain additional quantity of water is stored in impoundments on the subject property, and that impounding such quantity of water on the subject property is feasible. Bouman v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 628 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where an applicable code criterion requires that an existing structure have been issued all necessary permits in the past and a party raises a substantial issue concerning whether such is the case, the local government is required to adopt findings explaining why the code criterion is met and those findings must be supported by substantial evidence. Mercer v. Josephine County, 23 Or LUBA 608 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the evidence indicates that there are two rock cairns on the subject property which may be Native American burial cairns eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places, and the function of the cairns cannot be determined without further archaeological evaluation, there is not substantial evidence in the record to support a determination that there are no significant archaeological sites on the property. Larson v. Wallowa County, 23 Or LUBA 527 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where there is expert evidence in the record that traffic systems in the area are inadequate to serve a proposed golf course, and only conclusory evidence to the contrary, a local government's finding of compliance with a code standard requiring adequate rural facilities to serve the proposed use is not supported by substantial evidence in the record. Kaye v. Marion County, 23 Or LUBA 452 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the only evidence supporting a finding that a site contains 1.5 million cubic yards of aggregate material is a page from a reclamation application with that figure filled in, with no supporting documentation, the finding is not supported by substantial evidence in the record and is inadequate to comply with the Goal 5 inventory requirements of OAR 660-16-000. Calhoun v. Jefferson County, 23 Or LUBA 436 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Comments made by individual local government decision makers during deliberation on an application cannot constitute evidence in support of, or in opposition to, a challenged decision approving or denying such application. Forster v. Polk County, 23 Or LUBA 420 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Where the only evidence cited in the record strongly suggests that sewer service is unavailable to the subject property, and the availability of water service and storm drainage systems to serve the subject property is uncertain, a determination that a UGB amendment complies with Goal 14 factor 3, requiring "[o]rderly and economic provisions for public facilities and services," is not supported by substantial evidence. ODOT v. City of Newport, 23 Or LUBA 408 (1992).

1.6.1 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Generally. Even if the subject property is properly described as marginal farmland with poor drainage, where there is undisputed evidence in the record of the property's historic and current use for agricultural production and that the property has Class II and IV agricultural soils, a finding that the property "is not likely to be used for agricultural production" is not supported by substantial evidence. Brandt v. Marion County, 23 Or LUBA 316 (1992).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where a county code provision requires a finding that development of a proposed solar facility will "not result in unnecessary soil erosion or loss," and includes a provision that this finding "may be satisfied by the submittal and county approval of a soil and erosion control plan prepared by an adequately qualified individual," and "[t]he approved plan shall be attached to the decision as a condition of approval," that provision allows an applicant and the county the option of relying on a qualified soil and erosion control plan to satisfy the provision and, if that option is followed, by imposing a condition of approval that requires compliance with the approved plan. The phrase "attached to the decision as a condition of approval" is a term of art that does not mean that the plan must be physically attached to the decision. Harris v. Marion County, 78 Or LUBA 209 (2018).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where a county code provision requires that a proposed solar facility may not "create unnecessary negative impacts on agricultural operations," including dividing a field or multiple fields "in such a way that creates small or isolated pieces of property that are more difficult to farm," and placing solar facility components on lands in a manner that "could disrupt common and accepted farming practices," a hearings officer's decision errs in concluding that a 12-acre solar facility located on a 14.15-acre lot will not create an isolated strip of cultivated land because as s a matter of simple arithmetic, some portion of the 14.15-acre lot will remain outside the 12-acre solar facility. Harris v. Marion County, 78 Or LUBA 209 (2018).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. ORS 197.732(2)(c)(D) and OAR 660-004-0020(2)(d) require a finding that the proposed uses authorized by the proposed exception are "compatible with other adjacent uses or will be so rendered through measures designed to reduce adverse impacts." To establish compliance with OAR 660-004-0020(2)(d), the county's finding that the likely adverse impacts of the proposed uses allowed under the proposed exception are similar to the impacts of the existing uses must be supported by substantial evidence. The absence of evidence that the impacts would be different is not a basis to conclude that the impacts would be similar. Where this unsupported presumption that the impacts would be similar is the foundation of the much of the county's subsequent analysis, the presumption is not supported by substantial evidence, and remand is necessary for the county to adopt more adequate findings regarding compatibility, supported by substantial evidence. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Columbia County, 78 Or LUBA 547 (2018).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. ORS 197.732(2)(c)(D) and OAR 660-004-0020(2)(d) require a finding that the proposed uses authorized by the proposed exception are "compatible with other adjacent uses or will be so rendered through measures designed to reduce adverse impacts." The potential adverse impacts of different types of liquid bulk terminals affiliated with a deepwater port, such as an oil terminal versus a fertilizer export operation, could be different enough to require a separate analysis. Adequate findings regarding compatibility would start by identifying the likely adverse impacts of typical uses authorized under approved use categories, evaluating each use category separately, and if necessary specific types of uses within each category. The findings should also address the characteristics of uses on adjoining areas, and assess vulnerability to potential externalities from industrial uses in the exception area. Informed by those analyses, the county can then reach sustainable conclusions regarding whether the proposed uses are compatible with adjoining uses, or can be rendered compatible via identified measures. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Columbia County, 78 Or LUBA 547 (2018).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. A city council errs in concluding that a city council-devised future modification to a submitted but unsatisfactory drainage and grading plan that will be reviewed in a future non-public proceeding can satisfy a requirement that the storm drainage plan "maintain[s] pre-existing levels and meet[s] planning and engineering requirements." Pursuant to Gould v. Deschutes County, 216 Or App 150, 171 P3d 1017 (2007), the city council must determine whether the submitted drainage and grading plan complies with the approval criteria or must consider the modifications to the drainage plan identified by the city council in a proceeding that allows public participation. Dodds v. City of West Linn, 75 Or LUBA 24 (2017).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Under Armstrong v. Asten-Hill Co., 90 Or App 200, 752 P2d 312 (1988), the substantial evidence standard is not satisfied when "the credible evidence apparently weighs overwhelmingly in favor of one finding and the [decision maker] finds the other without giving a persuasive explanation." Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Although items of evidence, when viewed individually, might be sufficiently questionable that they would not be relied upon by a reasonable decision maker, when viewed together those same items of evidence might become evidence a reasonable person could accept in support of a challenged finding. Rivera v. City of Bandon, 38 Or LUBA 736 (2000).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. A reasonable person with an understanding of the assumptions and limitations that underlie USDA soils data would not rely on those data to conclude that sites rated to have severe soils limitations for small commercial uses for that reason alone cannot accommodate any commercial use. DLCD v. Douglas County, 38 Or LUBA 542 (2000).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where no issue is raised during local proceedings concerning whether a need to save significant trees on a site would reduce the number of houses that can be constructed on a site, the city was not required to adopt findings addressing that question. Absent some reason to suspect the trees presented a development constraint, the city's decision to rely on assumptions concerning development potential of the site that do not take the trees into account is supported by substantial evidence. Neighbors for Livability v. City of Beaverton, 37 Or LUBA 408 (1999).

1. 6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where the evidence is such that a reasonable person could conclude that a permit applicant failed to carry his burden of proof, the hearings officer's decision denying the permit is supported by substantial evidence. A hearings officer is not obligated to defer to an unopposed affidavit submitted by a permit applicant as establishing the facts alleged in the affidavit. River City Disposal v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 360 (1998).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. A permit applicant with the burden of demonstrating compliance with an off-site odor standard may not rely on the lack of odor-based complaints in an earlier code enforcement proceeding to establish compliance with the odor standard, where the record includes testimony about possible off-site odor problems. River City Disposal v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 360 (1998).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where the city's decision is based on a well-reasoned analysis that reaches the conclusion that a state road crossing a lot is located on an easement rather than on land owned in fee by the state, the city's determination that the lot may include the area occupied by the state road in determining whether the lot meets minimum lot size requirements is supported by substantial evidence. Marshall v. City of Yachats, 35 Or LUBA 82 (1998).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where LUBA concludes the evidence in the record is such that a reasonable person would rely on the evidence, the decision is supported by substantial evidence, notwithstanding that a reasonable person could also draw different conclusions. Rouse v. Tillamook County, 34 Or LUBA 530 (1998).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. In deciding whether a challenged decision is supported by substantial evidence in the whole record, LUBA is required to consider whether supporting evidence is refuted or undermined by other evidence in the record, but cannot reweigh the evidence. Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 106 (1994).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where LUBA concludes a reasonable person could reach the decision made by the local government, in view of all the evidence in the record, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between conflicting evidence. Bottum v. Union County, 26 Or LUBA 407 (1994).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Substantial evidence is evidence a reasonable person would rely upon to reach a conclusion, notwithstanding that different reasonable people could draw different conclusions from the evidence. Adler v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 546 (1993).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. The choice between conflicting believable evidence belongs to the local government, and so long as the evidence relied upon by the local government is such that a reasonable person could reach the conclusion that the local government reaches, the decision is supported by substantial evidence in the whole record. McInnis v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 376 (1993).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Substantial evidence is evidence a reasonable person would accept as adequate to support a conclusion. Absent some indication that the information provided by a traffic count at a single location is an unreliable indicator of the daily traffic on a road, the traffic count is substantial evidence of the daily traffic on that road. Reeves v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 483 (1993).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where a golf course adjoining an orchard will force alterations in accepted farming practices and increase the costs associated with such practices, the relevant question under ORS 215.296(1) is whether such alterations and increased costs will be significant. Where there is evidence in the whole record that would allow a local government decision maker to answer that question either way, LUBA is required by ORS 197.835(7)(a)(C) to defer to the local government's judgment. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 24 Or LUBA 271 (1992).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where a reasonable person would not conclude, based on the evidence cited in the record, that the proposed use will comply with an applicable approval standard, the local government's determination of compliance with that approval standard is not supported by substantial evidence. Reynolds v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 14 (1992).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Where the relevant facts are not in dispute, the choice between different reasonable conclusions based on the undisputed evidence in the record belongs to the local government. Dority v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 384 (1992).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. Substantial evidence is evidence a reasonable person would rely on in reaching a decision. Brandt v. Marion County, 23 Or LUBA 316 (1992).

1.6.2 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Definition of. The "evidence * * * which clearly supports the decision" standard of ORS 197.835(9)(b) imposes a higher evidentiary standard than the "substantial evidence" standard of ORS 197.835(7)(a)(C). Friedman v. Yamhill County, 23 Or LUBA 306 (1992).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. Aerial photographs and modified printouts of zoning maps generated from an electronic database, submitted in order to support a disputed question of fact, are not official enactments of a city or a source of law that is subject to official notice under ORS 40.090(7). Crowley v. City of Hood River, 77 Or LUBA 117 (2018).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. LUBA will not take official notice of a memorandum from the assistant director of the Oregon Department of Energy (DOE) to a staff person at the Oregon Department of Land Conservation and Development (DLCD) explaining the current opinion of the DOE, because such memorandum is not an "official act" of a state executive department pursuant to ORS 40.090(2). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Jackson County, 76 Or LUBA 488 (2017).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. A circuit court opinion letter is "decisional law" for purposes of Oregon Evidence Code 202, notwithstanding that the writ of review process that yielded the opinion letter has not yet concluded in a final judgment. J4J Miscellaneous PAC v. City of Jefferson, 75 Or LUBA 120 (2017).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. A local government commits remandable procedural error by taking official notice of natural resource base maps where the record does not establish that the maps are part of the comprehensive plan or land use regulations and does not establish that the maps were adopted by ordinance. Oregon Pipeline Company LLC v. Clatsop County, 69 Or LUBA 403 (2014).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. LUBA will strike documents attached to the petition for review that are offered as "context" for interpreting an administrative rule adopted in 1990, where the documents are not subject to official notice, long post-date the 1990 administrative rule, and could not provide "context" for interpreting the rule. Fritch v. Clackamas County, 68 Or LUBA 184 (2013).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. Notwithstanding OAR 661-010-0025(1), which requires that all "documents or other written materials" that are placed before the decision maker must be included in the record, a local government's consideration of a land use regulation in adopting a land use decision does not, by itself, require that the land use regulation be included as part of the record that must be submitted in a LUBA appeal, unless there is some reason to believe the local government intended to make a copy of the land use regulation part of the record of the local government's proceedings. However, LUBA routinely takes official notice of comprehensive plans and land use regulations under ORS 40.090(7) and OEC 202(7). Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Dunes City, 65 Or LUBA 452 (2012).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. A letter ruling from an Oregon circuit court judge constitutes decisional law and is therefore subject to official notice by LUBA. ODOT v. City of Mosier, 41 Or LUBA 73 (2001).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. LUBA will take official notice of zoning ordinances and judicially cognizable law, including decisional law. North Park Annex Bus. Trust v. City of Independence, 35 Or LUBA 827 (1998).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. LUBA cannot take official notice of a city's notice of adoption of ordinance pursuant to OEC 202(2) because the city's notice was not an "official act[] of the * * * executive department * * * of this state." Western PCS, Inc. v. City of Lake Oswego, 33 Or LUBA 369 (1997).

1.6.3 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Official Notice. With certain, limited exceptions, LUBA will not take official notice of historical facts contained in newspaper clippings that are not included in the record. DLCD v. City of St. Helens, 29 Or LUBA 485 (1995).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county's conclusion that a pesticide or herbicide label requires no setback from recreational areas, and, therefore, that approving a recreational area on EFU land will not force a significant change in accepted farm practices on surrounding lands devoted to farm use for purposes of the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), is not supported by substantial evidence where farmers and the Oregon Department of Agriculture interpret the label as requiring a setback that could preclude application of the herbicide in significant portions of farmland adjacent to the proposed recreational area and where there is no expert testimony supporting the county's interpretation. Schrepel v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 895 (2020).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a local code provision prohibits development, including fill, in certain special flood hazard areas unless the cumulative effect of the development, when combined with all other existing and anticipated development, will not increase the base flood elevation (BFE) more than one foot, a reasonable person would not rely on a letter from a professional engineer, which provides that the "minimal amounts of fill placed below the BFE" would have no measurable effect on the BFE, to conclude that the provision is satisfied, where the letter does not quantify the amount of fill associated with the development or address the cumulative effects of all other existing and anticipated development. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. City of North Bend, 81 Or LUBA 534 (2020).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where the applicable law does not expressly require expert testimony to establish compliance, while a reasonable decision-maker might not be able to rely on lay testimony where the record contains contrary expert testimony, a reasonable decision-maker might be able to rely on lay testimony where the record contains no contrary expert testimony. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 400 (2020).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a local code provision implementing OAR 660-006-0029 requires the decision-maker "to identify the building site" for a forest template dwelling by "weigh[ing] together" (1) the requirement to minimize the amount of forest lands used and (2) fire-safety development design standards, written testimony previously submitted in a different land use proceeding by lay individuals with personal knowledge that suggests that serious slope issues have prevented improving one alternative access route because of inability or expense of meeting local road design standards is substantial evidence that improving that alternative access route is impracticable where no contrary evidence is introduced into the record in the current proceeding. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 400 (2020).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. An attorney-land-use-consultant-prepared ESEE analysis including numerous plans, reports, and other documents supporting the redesignation and rezoning of protected habitat from forest land to marginal land under former ORS 197.247 (1991) is not sufficient to rebut expert testimony including (1) a letter authored by an ODFW biologist that generally discusses the cumulative impact of development on habitat and (2) general ODFW guidance related to levels of residential density in areas of peripheral big game habitat absent evidence of the attorney land use consultant's expertise. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a city bureau manages the city's transportation system, including private uses in the city right-of-way, and where bureau staff have special expertise in the safe and efficient use of the right-of-way and various demands on streets, including traffic, parking, and loading, statements from the bureau (1) that studio apartments have lower turnover rates, less need for unloading large furniture, and, thus, less need for a loading space, and (2) that signed, infrequent on-street loading will not have a negative effect on the traffic safety or other transportation functions of the abutting right-of-way are evidence that would permit a reasonable person to find that an on-street loading space is adequate for a proposed studio apartment building's loading needs such that the development continues to meet the intended purpose of, and, therefore, qualifies for an adjustment to, an off-street loading space requirement, even where there is testimony in the record from an opponent of the development regarding anticipated negative congestion and safety impacts of off-street loading. NDNA v. City of Portland, 80 Or LUBA 269 (2019).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. When a hearings officer weighs the testimony of several experts and articulates how and why he came to his decision based on the experience and findings of the experts, petitioner needs to provide adequate reason before LUBA will second-guess the hearings officer's decision. Without reason to review the hearings officer's decision LUBA will conclude that the findings are adequate and supported by substantial evidence. Gould v. Deschutes County, 78 Or LUBA 118 (2018).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A reasonable person could conclude, based on expert testimony, that the 14-foot paved width of the only access street is sufficient to ensure compliance with a planned unit development (PUD) approval standard requiring that the PUD is not an "impediment to emergency response," where there is evidence that with adjoining paved or graveled parking areas to allow opposing traffic to pull over, the access street could allow emergency vehicle access in the same manner as a "queuing street," notwithstanding that the access street does not possess all the characteristics of a queuing street. Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Expert testimony that parking along a narrow access road is only "intermittent" is substantial evidence supporting a finding that the narrow road does not represent an "impediment to emergency response," given the absence of any countervailing evidence that parking along both sides is so continuous that there is no room for opposing traffic to pull over to allow emergency vehicles to pass. Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where county code requires a building in which marijuana is grown to be "equipped with an effective odor control system" which must "prevent unreasonable interference of neighbors' use and enjoyment of their property," and the odor control system is deemed permitted only after the applicant submits "a report by a [licensed] mechanical engineer * * * demonstrating that the system will control odor so as not to unreasonably interfere with neighbors' use and enjoyment of their property," a board of county commissioners' conclusion that the application satisfies these requirements is supported by substantial evidence where it relies upon an engineers' report which demonstrates that the applicant's proposed odor control system "will control" odor as designed. The odor control system need not be actually built prior to the project receiving approval. King v. Deschutes County, 77 Or LUBA 339 (2018).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. LUBA will deny a petitioner's challenges to a county board of commissioners' conclusion that a project application satisfies the county code requirement that "[s]ustained noise" generated from a building in which marijuana is grown "shall not exceed 30 dB(A)," based upon statements made in the applicant's engineers' report where petitioner argues the engineer reports failed to adequately describe the system as built, did not consider site-specific characteristics or address allegations that the odor control systems will generate noise in excess of 30 dB(A), but petitioner failed to point to any evidence in the record that calls into question the engineer's statements that the operation will not produce "sustained" noise that exceeds permissible levels. King v. Deschutes County, 77 Or LUBA 339 (2018).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A hearings officer's decision relying upon intervenor's traffic study is supported by substantial evidence where the hearings officer addressed petitioner's challenges to the credibility of the traffic study by citing to testimony of the intervenor's traffic engineer responding to each of petitioner's challenges. Willis v. Clackamas County, 76 Or LUBA 244 (2017).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. LUBA will affirm a finding that a proposed gas processing facility will not cause emissions of steam that could obscure visibility within an airport approach surface, where the finding is supported by substantial expert testimony that the facility will not generate visible steam and in any case is proposed to be located outside the airport approach surface. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 76 Or LUBA 346 (2017).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Remand is necessary where a county finds that exclusion zones around liquefied natural gas tankers in a narrow estuary will not interfere with public trusts right to use the estuary based on the county's understanding that the Coast Guard will allow "known" boats to traverse the exclusion zone without delay, but the expert evidence in the record does not support that finding. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 76 Or LUBA 346 (2017).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government's decision that traffic impacts from a proposed PUD can be mitigated is supported by substantial evidence in the record where a Traffic Impact Analysis prepared by a transportation engineer assumes a growth rate of two percent and there is no evidence in the record to call that assumed growth rate into question. Talbott v. City of Happy Valley, 74 Or LUBA 143 (2016).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government's decision that materials submitted with an application for final plan approval of a planned unit development that provide detailed information about the location and size of building envelopes, dwelling heights, and the location of trees, utilities, the driveway, and the retaining wall are "sufficiently detailed to indicate fully the ultimate operation and appearance of the development" is supported by substantial evidence in the record, and evidence that a reasonable person would rely on in making the decision. Harrison v. City of Cannon Beach, 74 Or LUBA 202 (2016).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where OAR 660-023-0180 sets a default maximum mining impact area of 1500 feet, and the county employed an impact area of one-half mile and relied on testimony from the operator of a nearby cattle operation and a second person with experience with mining impacts on cattle in other locations to conclude that the one-half-mile impact area did not need to be extended based on potential mining noise impacts on cattle, the county's decision that the one-half-mile impact area need not be extended is supported by substantial evidence. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 72 Or LUBA 45 (2015).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. While the evaluation of impacts on estuarine resources required by Goal 16, Implementation Requirement 1 need not be prepared by an expert, the nature of some types of potential adverse impacts caused by development on estuarine resources may be such that some technical expertise is necessary to provide substantial evidence to support conclusions based on the evaluation. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where the record includes expert testimony that residential development may adversely impact endangered salmon species in an adjacent estuary through pollution from stormwater runoff, some level of scientific or professional expertise is necessary to rebut that testimony in order to provide supporting evidence for a contrary conclusion. A letter from the applicant's attorney opining that stormwater runoff will not adversely impact salmon is not substantial evidence to support that conclusion. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Land use proceedings are not governed by rules of evidence, and a local government may rely in part on a planner's testimony regarding a phone conversation with the fire district chief, among other evidence, to conclude that the water supply is sufficient for fire suppression, notwithstanding that the fire district chief did not submit direct testimony. Foland v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 247 (2014).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A city's finding that a historic resource is not capable of generating a reasonable economic return is supported by substantial evidence, where the applicant submitted detailed studies showing that the cost of rehabilitating the structure to meet current building codes would far exceed the reasonable rental value, notwithstanding conflicting testimony by opponents that rehabilitation costs could be lower, and rental returns higher, than the applicant's experts estimated. Rushing v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 448 (2014).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a hearings official is faced with testimony from one expert that a proposal's sewage effluent would be residential strength and from another expert that the proposal's effluent would be greater than residential strength, and both experts' testimony is believable, the choice of which expert to believe lies with the hearings official. Teen Challenge v. Lane County, 67 Or LUBA 300 (2013).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A governing body errs in relying upon the personal knowledge of its members who are farmers to resolve a disputed issue regarding whether proposed disturbances to topsoil would render the subject property unfit for future agricultural use. The effect of topsoil disturbance on agricultural productivity is an arcane subject, and even if the farmer/commissioners have expert personal knowledge of that subject, it is inappropriate to approve or deny an application based on the decision-makers' personal knowledge of disputed facts rather than on the evidence submitted during the evidentiary proceeding. Hood River Valley PRD v. Hood River County, 67 Or LUBA 314 (2013).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. LUBA will not second guess a land use decision maker's choice between conflicting expert testimony, so long as it appears to LUBA that a reasonable person could decide as the decision maker did based on all of the evidence in the record. Willamette Oaks, LLC v. City of Eugene, 67 Or LUBA 351 (2013).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Despite some equivocal statements in a soil scientist's report regarding whether soil represents a variant of an existing soil type or a new unknown soil type, the county's conclusion that the soil represents a variant is supported by substantial evidence, where the only evidence on this point is the soil scientist's, and it is reasonably clear that he ultimately concluded that the soil is a variant. Rogue Advocates v. Josephine County, 66 Or LUBA 45 (2012).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where none of the applicable approval criteria require that evidence must be provided by an engineer licensed in Oregon or require the city's decision to be based solely on the testimony of a licensed engineer, the fact that the engineer is not licensed in Oregon, by itself, is not a basis to reverse or remand the decision. Hill v. City of Portland, 66 Or LUBA 250 (2012).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A petitioner's unsupported opinion that locating a proposed cell tower in a residential zone with a 75-foot height limit is a reasonable alternative to locating the proposed 150-foot tall tower in a farm zone, because there is no significant difference in coverage between 75-foot and 150-foot tall towers, does not undermine the expert evidence the county relied upon to conclude that a 75-foot tall tower would not meet the cell provider's coverage objectives. Oberdorfer v. Harney County, 64 Or LUBA 47 (2011).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A petitioner's argument that a cell-phone provider could meet its coverage objectives by co-locating its antennas on existing cell-phone towers does not provide a basis for remand, where the record includes expert testimony that co-location would not meet the provider's coverage objectives and petitioner cites no evidence in the record to the contrary. Oberdorfer v. Harney County, 64 Or LUBA 47 (2011).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a hearings officer specifically recognizes that there is conflicting expert testimony and the expert testimony he finds more persuasive is believable, his decision is supported by substantial evidence. Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. In order to add a site to a local government's inventory of significant aggregate sites, an applicant must demonstrate that threshold amounts of aggregate are present on the site based on a "representative set of samples of aggregate material in the deposit on the site" under OAR 660-023-0180(3)(a). Where nothing in the Goal 5 rule specifies any particular standards that govern the methodology used to collect "a representative set of samples," a county does not err in accepting and relying on samples collected using methods that a reasonable professional geologist would employ to determine the quantity of aggregate present on the site. Protect Grand Island Farms v. Yamhill County, 64 Or LUBA 179 (2011).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where the local government recognizes that there is conflicting expert testimony and the expert testimony the local government finds more persuasive is believable, the decision is supported by substantial evidence. Protect Grand Island Farms v. Yamhill County, 64 Or LUBA 179 (2011).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a local code provision requires that an applicant for a partition demonstrate that the parcels created be "suitable for residential use considering * * * fire hazards," the local government errs in failing to consider expert evidence regarding the proposed parcels' unsuitability for residential use considering fire hazards because the local government mistakenly concludes that such considerations will be considered at dwelling approval stage. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 63 Or LUBA 288 (2011).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A forestry consultant's conclusion that land is not forest land subject to Goal 4 is not supported by the record, where it is based on an erroneous assumption that the county's comprehensive plan provides a productivity threshold of 80 cubic feet per acre of per year for lands suitable for commercial forestry. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 62 Or LUBA 80 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Although a hearing official is entitled to rely on the expert opinion of a county sanitarian that a required septic drain-field expansion is feasible, where opponents offer a detailed explanation for why the subject property may not be able to accommodate the required expansion and replacement drain-field, the county sanitarian must supply more than an unexplained expression of belief that the needed expansion is feasible. Phillips v. Lane County, 62 Or LUBA 92 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A condition of zone change approval limiting use of the property to a proposed travel plaza is insufficient to ensure consistency with the Transportation Planning Rule at OAR 660-012-0060, where the record indicates that even limited to the travel plaza the zone change will significantly affect nearby transportation facilities, and the county failed to require other mitigation or improvements necessary to ensure that allowed uses are consistent with the capacity and performance measures of affected intersections. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where the opponents' traffic engineer testifies based on data in the record that a left turn lane is required to ensure that the proposed use complies with a local transportation standard, and the applicant's traffic engineer disagrees, but without citing any evidence or explaining the basis for the contrary opinion, the applicant's engineer's unsupported opinion is not substantial evidence demonstrating compliance with the standard. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Remand is necessary where the applicant's traffic engineer declines to consider the impact of large spectator events at an already approved speedway near the proposed travel plaza, because the speedway events would "overwhelm" the local transportation system, without explaining why those impacts can be ignored in evaluating whether the local transportation system has the "carrying capacity" to handle traffic from the proposed travel plaza. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Absent countervailing evidence, a letter from an applicant's engineer relating the site visit and verbal agreement of representatives from the Department of State Lands (DSL) and Department of Geology and Mineral Industries (DOGAMI) that DOGAMI and not DSL has jurisdiction over a proposed riparian mining operation is substantial evidence a decision maker could rely upon to conclude that DOGAMI has jurisdiction over the operation. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Curry County, 61 Or LUBA 8 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. When nearby ranchers submit evidence that conflicts with the applicant's expert testimony regarding whether the property could be used in conjunction with other land for farm use, even though that evidence could constitute substantial evidence, the county was entitled to rely on the conflicting evidence submitted by the applicant's expert. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 60 Or LUBA 131 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local partition criterion that a new parcel be suited for the intended use does not necessarily require submission of engineering studies or design plans for water, septic, or storm water facilities. In the absence of parcel size, topographic or other constraints on facility adequacy, a reasonable person could rely on expert testimony that the parcel can accommodate required facilities for the intended use, even if that testimony is unsupported by engineering studies or facility design plans. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 60 Or LUBA 336 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Testimony from a land surveyor and project manager at an engineering consulting firm that the firm's engineers have conducted preliminary investigations and consulted with appropriate state agencies and concluded based on those investigations and consultations that a proposed parcel is suited for the intended use, considering water supply, septic and storm water disposal, is expert testimony that a decision maker could reasonably rely upon to find that the parcel is suited for the intended use. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 60 Or LUBA 336 (2010).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where the record includes conflicting believable evidence about whether an applicant's assumption that 90 percent of the groundwater withdrawn for use by a destination resort will be returned to the subsurface hydrologic system and the county hearings officer findings recognize the conflicting evidence but choose to rely on the applicant's expert's position, which had been accepted by the Oregon Water Resources Department, the hearings officer's findings on that question are supported by substantial evidence. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county reasonably concludes that the record does not include "factual information indicating significant potential conflicts" with respect to whether a proposed quarry will disrupt sage grouse flights to and from a protected breeding site, where the only evidence suggesting that grouse flights come near the quarry site is a map the significance of which is subject to conflicting expert testimony. Walker v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 488 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county does not err in relying on a 2007 soil study to conclude that a parcel is not agricultural land under Goal 3, notwithstanding the absence in the record of a 2001 soil study that the applicant's consultant cites, where the 2007 study is intended to stand on its own and petitioners do not identify any critical information missing from the 2007 study that might be found in the 2001 study. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 58 Or LUBA 101 (2008).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A finding that a proposed truck stop will not create a traffic hazard is not supported by substantial evidence, where the traffic impact analysis finds that the nearest intersection presents only a "marginal safety concern" but fails to take into account the 1,000 daily truck and vehicle trips the proposed truck stop will send through the intersection, and there is no evidence that the additional traffic will not significantly decrease the intersection's safety or significantly increase the crash rate. Western Land & Cattle, Inc. v. Umatilla County, 58 Or LUBA 295 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Reports and approvals from the Federal Aviation Administration and Oregon Department of Aviation that a proposed personal use airport complies with federal and state safety requirements is substantial evidence that a county could rely upon, among other evidence, to conclude that the airport is consistent with a comprehensive plan policy requiring that airports be located in areas that are safe for air operations. Johnson v. Marion County, 58 Or LUBA 459 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Substantial evidence supports a county's finding that a 160-acre parcel is not suitable for an independent grazing operation, where the property has never supported an independent grazing operation, and an agricultural consultant's study details significant capital inputs needed to establish a new, independent grazing operation that could not be recovered from income reasonably expected from such a grazing operation. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 58 Or LUBA 638 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county could reasonably choose to rely on a consultant's economic analysis to conclude that a 160-acre parcel is not "other suitable land" under OAR 660-033-0020(1)(a)(B) because it cannot be profitably combined with nearby grazing operations, notwithstanding that nearby ranchers testified that they had successfully used the property in conjunction with their grazing operation in the past and believe they can do so again, where the economic analysis sets out a detailed, if hypothetical, budget demonstrating that such combined use could not be conducted with the primary purpose of obtaining a profit in money, and the nearby ranchers do not provide any similar budget or explanation for why they believe a combined operation would be financially beneficial to them. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 58 Or LUBA 638 (2009).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county errs in relying on testimony of a general well constructor to conclude that digging 32 new wells would not adversely affect the underlying aquifer, where (1) the constructor's testimony is based on the current functioning of three wells in the area and does not address the impacts of 32 new wells, (20 the constructor provided no water budget for the aquifer or similar data, and (3) the opponents submitted a detailed study and water budget from an acknowledged aquifer expert who testified that 32 new wells would adversely impact the aquifer. Gardener v. Marion County, 56 Or LUBA 583 (2008).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A hearings officer may rely on undisputed expert testimony that compliance with federal radio frequency exposure limits depends on whether non-employees at the site are aware of occupational exposure levels and have the ability to remove themselves from the site, combined with the fact that the site is fenced and signed to warn of occupational exposure levels, to conclude that a proposed broadcast tower complies with federal exposure limits. Curl v. City of Bend, 56 Or LUBA 746 (2008).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. While an astronomer's testimony regarding the impact of dust on an observatory's telescopes is substantial evidence from which a reasonable decision maker could conclude that dust from an open-pit mining operation would significantly conflict with the observatory, the county could nonetheless rely on the distance between the site and the observatory and proposed measures to control dust to conclude that the mine would not significantly conflict with the observatory. Walker v. Deschutes County, 55 Or LUBA 93 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Expert testimony that an existing firearms training facility in a forest zone is a fire hazard and increases costs and risks of fire suppression is not sufficient to undermine a finding to the contrary, where the testimony is based on the operation of the facility as a whole, and not on the post-1995 improvements that are the subject of the application. Citizens for Responsibility v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 1 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. LUBA will affirm the hearings officer's choice to rely on a traffic model that has not been "calibrated" against real-world data, where the applicable guidelines stress the importance of calibration but do not state that calibration is the only way to ensure that the model is accurate, and the applicant's expert testifies that the model is reliable notwithstanding the absence of calibration. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Gresham, 54 Or LUBA 16 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A finding that it is feasible to construct a driveway that complies with maximum finished grade standards is not supported by substantial evidence, where the proposed driveway alignment clearly does not comply, the applicant's engineer stated generally that an alternate alignment is likely to meet grade standards but submitted no plans or drawings demonstrating the location or feasibility of that alignment, and the opponents' engineer submitted detailed testimony supported by drawings showing that the suggested alternate alignment will not comply. Lenox v. Jackson County, 54 Or LUBA 272 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county reasonably relies on a forester's opinion that Ponderosa pine is a more valuable species to grow on certain soils than Douglas fir, over conflicting opinions by persons who are not soil or forestry experts. Anderson v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 669 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A hearings officer errs in concluding, based on expert testimony that isolated dwellings force firefighters to choose either to abandon such homes or to devote insufficient resources to defend them, that the proposed isolated dwelling will not significantly increase fire suppression costs or risks to fire suppression personnel because firefighters would simply abandon the dwelling. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 53 Or LUBA 290 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Remand is necessary where the applicant's forest consultant recommends vegetation removal as necessary to ensure compliance with approval criteria for a large tract forest dwelling, but the hearings officer does not adopt a condition of approval to that effect or explain why such measures are not necessary to ensure compliance with approval criteria. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 53 Or LUBA 290 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Under a code standard requiring that a forest dwelling be located at a site that minimizes the risks associated with wildfire, remand is necessary where the opponents' expert testified that the preferred site is isolated and will incur significantly more risk and cost to firefighters over alternative sites, there is no rebuttal of that testimony, and the findings do not state a sufficient basis to reject that testimony. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 53 Or LUBA 290 (2007).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Expert testimony is not required in order to satisfy the requirement that a demonstration of forest productivity of a property be shown by empirical evidence; a study, prepared by an applicant seeking to redesignate the subject property as nonresource, which is subsequently reviewed by a Department of Forestry forester, is evidence upon which a reasonable person would rely. Hecker v. Lane County, 52 Or LUBA 91 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Absent countervailing evidence, expert testimony expressing doubt that Ponderosa pine can be established on a parcel even under intensive management techniques is substantial evidence supporting the local government's conclusion that the property cannot produce Ponderosa pine. Just v. Linn County, 52 Or LUBA 145 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. In determining whether a property is generally unsuitable for the production of farm crops and livestock or merchantable tree species, a county's conclusion that any historic agricultural use on the property before that time does not provide a substantial hurdle is supported by substantial evidence where the county chooses to rely on an expert's opinion that proposed nonfarm parcels have not been used for agricultural operation in the past 20 years. Peterson v. Crook County, 52 Or LUBA 160 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Under Armstrong v. Asten-Hill Co., 90 Or App 200, 752 P2d 312 (1988), the substantial evidence standard is not satisfied when "the credible evidence apparently weighs overwhelmingly in favor of one finding and the [decision maker] finds the other without giving a persuasive explanation." Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. It is not unreasonable for a local decision maker to cite issues raised regarding the evidence submitted by an applicant's engineers that were not responded to, and to rely on opponents' experts' testimony to find that the applicant failed to carry its burden of proof. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government could reasonably accept as true an expert's testimony about the findings in a biological assessment, even though the biological assessment itself is not in the record. Neighbors 4 Responsible Growth v. City of Veneta, 52 Or LUBA 325 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. The testimony of experts in assessing the risk of turbid water discharges from proposed aggregate mining in a river's floodplain and the risk of avulsion is likely to be critical. Experts must collect and analyze the data and draw scientific conclusions to assess that risk and ultimately the issue will likely be which experts the decision maker finds more believable. Westside Rock v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 264 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where there is conflicting expert testimony regarding the location of a river channel migration zone and the probability that the river channel might migrate to capture a proposed floodplain mining site causing river turbidity, the county's decision to believe the larger channel migration zone should apply is supported by substantial evidence. Westside Rock v. Clackamas County, 51 Or LUBA 264 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A fire district letter opining that conducting large concert events of up to 5,500 people on a forest-zoned parcel would not significantly increase the risk of wildfires is not substantial evidence to support a finding to that effect, where the letter is expressly contingent on the applicant maintaining a prohibition on burning of any kind, and the evidence regarding the effectiveness of banning burning of any kind during large concert events is extremely limited and conclusory. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's conclusion that a standard requiring that development not "seriously interfere" with sensitive riparian habitat is not met, notwithstanding that the only evidence on that point is the testimony of the applicant's consultant, where that testimony is based on an assertion that the proposed campground and parking areas "stay well clear" of sensitive riparian habitat, but the site plan clearly shows that the proposed campground and parking area are located adjacent to the riparian habitat. Horning v. Washington County, 51 Or LUBA 303 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. An acoustic engineer's statement that the procedures followed in conducting a noise study for an aggregate mine were "generally consistent" with procedures required by state administrative rule is sufficient to demonstrate compliance with the rule, particularly where the petitioners do not identify any material difference between the procedures followed and those required the rule. Ray v. Josephine County, 51 Or LUBA 443 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Largely unchallenged testimony of a county engineer who is a professional engineer, but not a traffic engineer, may constitute substantial evidence concerning the safety of a proposed intersection. Ghena v. Josephine County, 51 Or LUBA 681 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a development code requires that a city find that transportation facilities will be available prior to or at the time of development of annexed property, testimony by an applicant's traffic engineer and the city engineer that traffic facilities needed to serve annexed property will be available prior to or at the time of development is substantial evidence supporting a city's finding that the development code requirement is satisfied. Friends of Bull Mountain v. City of Tigard, 51 Or LUBA 759 (2006).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county's decision to amend its deer winter range map redesignating property from "critical" deer habitat to "impacted deer winter range" is supported by substantial evidence where the county makes a reasonable choice to rely on the applicant's expert, who conducted only one site visit and reviewed data that had previously been prepared by the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife, and concluded that the proposal would not significantly impact deer winter range. Anthony v. Josephine County, 50 Or LUBA 573 (2005).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A herbaceous forage survey is not substantial evidence upon which a county may rely in determining that a property is "generally unsuitable" for the production of farm crops and livestock or merchantable tree species pursuant to ORS 215.263(5), where it impossible to ascertain what area the surveys studied and where the survey does not consider potential herbaceous forage capacity if the properties were irrigated. Peterson v. Crook County, 49 Or LUBA 223 (2005).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. An expert study concluding that a clay layer prevents rainwater from permeating down to the aquifer and that proposed storm water facilities will ensure that post-development hydrology differs little from pre-development hydrology is substantial evidence a reasonable person could rely upon to conclude that proposed development will not adversely affect the aquifer or wells that rely on it. Dinges v. City of Oregon City, 49 Or LUBA 376 (2005).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government may rely on portions of two conflicting expert studies of soil classifications, although explanatory findings may be necessary to identify what portions are relied upon, and to resolve any differences or contradictions between the studies relied upon, so that LUBA may perform its review function. Doob v. Josephine County, 48 Or LUBA 227 (2004).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Expert evidence that an enhanced wetland is very unlikely to attract species that would conflict with operation of an adjoining aggregate mine is substantial evidence to support a finding that the enhanced wetlands will not "adversely impact" the mine, notwithstanding conflicting evidence on that point and the fact that the applicant's expert could not guarantee no adverse impacts. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A code standard requiring that a proposed use will not interfere with or cause an adverse impact on a mining operation does not require evidence that adverse impacts are impossible; rather, it requires the decision maker to evaluate probabilities. Expert evidence that it is "highly unlikely" that wetland enhancements will attract species that might lead to restrictions on a mining operation is evidence a reasonable person could rely on to find compliance with the adverse impacts standard, notwithstanding conflicting expert evidence on that point. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Expert testimony that is not in the record and that appears only as reported by the applicant to staff is not sufficient to establish the capacity of the subject property for farm and forest uses. Friends of Douglas County v. Douglas County, 46 Or LUBA 757 (2004).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Substantial evidence supports a hearings officer's conclusion that only five percent of traffic generated by a proposed church would turn south at an affected intersection, and that traffic counts performed in February are indicative of summer peak traffic loads, where it is undisputed that few if any church members reside south of the intersection, and the applicant's traffic engineer testified that the affected intersection is not subject to seasonal fluctuations in traffic levels. Noble v. Clackamas County, 45 Or LUBA 366 (2003).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A traffic study concluding that there is adequate vehicular access to a shopping mall is substantial evidence supporting a finding of "adequate access and traffic control," notwithstanding that the study did not consider or quantify internal store-to-store vehicular traffic, where there is no evidence that such internal traffic is significant. Graham Oil Co. v. City of North Bend, 44 Or LUBA 18 (2003).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where petitioners present evidence and testimony that a property is not predominately composed of Class IV through Class VIII soils because an access easement that covers over 25 percent of the property is not wholly comprised of Class VI soils, and the testimony of the applicant's soil scientist does not explain why the entire easement is comprised of Class VI soils, the county's determination that the property is predominately composed of Class IV through VIII soils is not supported by substantial evidence. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 44 Or LUBA 777 (2003).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A city is entitled to rely on expert testimony that a specific model of the flood depth and velocity over the subject property is necessary to demonstrate compliance with a standard requiring no significant hazard to life or property, and the city may decline to extrapolate that information from other expert testimony that models an adjacent area. Starks Landing, Inc. v. City of Rivergrove, 43 Or LUBA 237 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. ORS 672.025(3), pertaining to the duties of engineers, permits an engineer to survey property to "determine area and topography" and to "establish lines, grades and elevations," so long as the engineer's survey is not used to convey property. Mertz v. Clackamas County, 43 Or LUBA 313 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a regional transportation plan (RTP) specifies that a proposed interchange will include "five lane overpasses," and the record includes a planning program manager's interpretation that a short sixth exit lane does not make the interchange inconsistent with the RTP, it is not error for the decision maker to rely on that interpretation and reasoning in determining that the interchange is consistent with the five-lane overpass described in the RTP. Witham Parts and Equipment Co. v. ODOT, 42 Or LUBA 435 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. In determining whether conflicting uses can be minimized pursuant to OAR 660-023-0180(4), a local government may draw reasonable inferences from expert testimony to determine that a numerical standard for minimization, such as for turbidity, cannot be satisfied. Molalla River Reserve, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 251 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a finding concerning traffic safety is not supported by substantial evidence in the record, but it is clear that traffic safety was at most a peripheral concern and other findings addressing a general "adversely affects neighborhoods" standard make it clear that the county's focus was on roadway and intersection capacity rather than traffic safety per se, the lack of evidence supporting the disputed traffic safety finding provides no basis for reversal or remand. Swyter v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 30 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Petitioner fails to overcome the county's determination that property is forest land under Goal 4, and fails to demonstrate as a matter of law that land is not "suitable for commercial forest uses," where petitioner's own expert testifies that notwithstanding limitations on productivity the subject property is in a "medium productivity range" and would yield $81,300 worth of commercial timber at 50 years, after an investment of $7,450. Potts v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 1 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where expert testimony that grazing use of property would require .45 inches of irrigation water per day during peak irrigation times is not challenged below, the county could reasonably rely on that testimony. Doob v. Josephine County, 41 Or LUBA 303 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Substantial evidence supports a finding that a proposed high school will not increase traffic through an affected intersection during the peak morning hour, notwithstanding failure of the traffic study to take certain trips into account, where the decision imposes conditions that effectively eliminate the possibility of those trips impacting the intersection. Friends of Collins View v. City of Portland, 41 Or LUBA 261 (2002).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. An architect's unsupported statement that a proposed structure is 14,719 square feet in size and thus complies with a local standard limiting permissible size to 14,723 square feet is not substantial evidence supporting a finding of compliance with the standard, where the opponents offered detailed evidence showing that the structure exceeds the maximum size and the applicant failed to either explain the architect's supporting calculations or refute the opposing evidence. Weaver v. Linn County, 40 Or LUBA 203 (2001).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Expert testimony that existing riprap will prevent dune retreat if repaired when damaged is substantial evidence supporting the county's finding under Goal 18 that the dune upon which development is proposed is stabilized and not subject to wave overtopping or ocean undercutting, notwithstanding conflicting expert evidence that the riprap may be insufficient or may fail. Save Oregon's Cape Kiwanda v. Tillamook County, 40 Or LUBA 143 (2001).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Although continued location of wells on a single aquifer may eventually have an adverse impact on other properties that use the aquifer, a decision based on expert testimony that the application at issue will not have an adverse impact on other properties is supported by substantial evidence. Durig v. Washington County, 40 Or LUBA 1 (2001).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a county adopts unchallenged findings that siting a cellular phone tower next to a power line right-of-way does not create a hazardous condition, because the tower is designed to collapse in on itself in high winds rather than fall to the side, and those findings are supported by testimony from an engineer with the company that will construct the tower, the county's findings are adequate and supported by substantial evidence. Pereira v. Columbia County, 39 Or LUBA 575 (2001).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government may not explicitly rely on a traffic study to demonstrate compliance with Goal 12 and then ignore a portion of the traffic study that describes anticipated deterioration in level of service. DLCD v. Klamath County, 38 Or LUBA 769 (2000).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government could reasonably rely upon evidence given by a photogrammetrist with 21 years of experience who had provided services for local governments in the past and provided a detailed analysis of his findings in a written report, where no challenge to the photogrammetrist's credentials was made to the local decision maker. Crook v. Curry County, 38 Or LUBA 677 (2000).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's choice between conflicting expert testimony where a reasonable person could conclude, based on the testimony of applicant's expert, that a proposed intersection provides a sight distance exceeding that required by the code, notwithstanding the contrary testimony of opponents' engineer. Mitchell v. Washington County, 37 Or LUBA 452 (2000).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a hearings officer rejects a proposed stormwater control method as inadequate to ensure compliance with an approval criterion that requires reduction of flood flows below erosive capacity, but nonetheless finds compliance with the standard based on the hearings officer's unsupported opinion that more adequate methods are available, the finding of compliance is not supported by substantial evidence. Mitchell v. Washington County, 37 Or LUBA 452 (2000).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A city's denial of a permit to construct a house proposed to be cantilevered out over the face of a sand bluff is supported by substantial evidence, where there is conflicting expert testimony regarding adverse impacts from structural supports sunk into the face of the bluff, and the city reasonably chose to believe an expert opinion that under no circumstances should the face of the bluff be compromised. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 37 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Neighbors' testimony regarding adverse impacts of vibration from construction on the integrity of a sand bluff underlying adjacent properties is substantial evidence supporting the city's denial of a house proposed to be built on the bluff, notwithstanding a contrary conclusion inferred from geotechnical reports supporting the application. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 37 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Whether composting qualifies as a farm use under ORS 215.203(2)(a) is a question of statutory interpretation, not a question of whether agricultural experts believe composting, in the abstract, falls within a scientific definition of farm use. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. The evidence supporting a decision denying a permit need not match the evidence supporting the permit application in a qualitative and quantitative sense. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 35 Or LUBA 421 (1999).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where there is no evidence that a property only functions as winter range between December 1 and March 31, the selection of that time period for a condition of approval is not supported by substantial evidence. It is not within generally accepted knowledge that property only functions as winter range between December 1 and March 31. Botham v. Union County, 34 Or LUBA 648 (1998).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Selected portions of an engineer's letter, cited to support a finding that water supply is adequate, do not constitute substantial evidence where that finding is undermined by the engineer's letter taken as a whole and by other conflicting evidence. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 33 Or LUBA 225 (1997).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Population projections of a witness who is not shown to be qualified by education or experience to evaluate evidence and draw conclusions concerning a highly technical and complex subject raise substantial evidence concerns, particularly when they are contradicted by the official population estimates prepared by the Center for Population Research and Census (CPRC) and letters from CPRC experts. Concerned Citizens v. Jackson County, 33 Or LUBA 70 (1997).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where the resume of a soil scientist does not establish his credentials to determine forest productivity and the only scientific data in the record are the results of soil tests, the soil scientist's conclusions with respect to forest productivity are not substantial evidence. DLCD v. Curry County, 31 Or LUBA 503 (1996).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Findings are inadequate when they rely on a consultant's summary conclusions which are not based on evidence in the record. Friends of Metolius v. Jefferson County, 31 Or LUBA 160 (1996).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. An unsupported statement in an application is not evidence, and an estimate of a geologist as to resource quantity, made without reference to evidence of any kind, is not substantial evidence. Palmer v. Lane County, 29 Or LUBA 436 (1995).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A lack of response from the county Road Master is not substantial evidence that a code provision requiring no undue impairment of traffic flow is met. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 159 (1994).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. With regard to reliance on the testimony of an expert, the substantial evidence standard of ORS 197.835(7)(a)(C) requires only that, considering all the relevant evidence in the record, a reasonable person could have chosen to rely on the expert's conclusions. Bates v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 21 (1994).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. There is no requirement that an expert witness explain the basis for all assumptions underlying the expert's evidence, or that evidence supporting the expert's assumptions be included in the record. Under ORS

197.835(7)(a)(C), where petitioners argue an assumption underlying an expert's conclusions is undermined by other evidence, LUBA must determine whether, considering all relevant evidence in the record, a reasonable person could rely on the expert's conclusions. ODOT v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 141 (1994).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A state agency report, based on a recent inspection of the subject property, concluding that a limited exemption "remains valid for the majority of [the] site" is substantial evidence that a limited exemption from the agency's regulatory requirements has been granted. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. It is reasonable for a local government decision maker to rely upon statements made by representatives of the Oregon Department of Transportation (ODOT) stating that ODOT's requirements are met, even though the evidence underlying the ODOT representatives' statements is not included in the local record. Citizens for Resp. Growth v. City of Seaside, 26 Or LUBA 458 (1994).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A reasonable decision maker could rely upon testimony by a consultant that RV parks in a selected area are unable to accommodate RV travelers' needs, to support a decision granting a reasons exception to Goal 3 based on a demonstrated need for more RV parks in the area. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Marion County, 26 Or LUBA 448 (1994).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A local government's decision that a proposed plan map amendment would negatively impact groundwater quantity and violate an applicable plan criterion is supported by substantial evidence where there is conflicting lay and expert testimony, and the expert testimony concedes the uncertainty of the proposal's impacts. Ericsson v. Washington County, 26 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Testimony from an Oregon Department of Forestry (DOF) representative which suggests a proposed dwelling could be compatible with forest uses, but was clarified by the DOF representative to eliminate any suggestion of compatibility, is not evidence a reasonable decision maker would rely upon to establish a proposed nonforest dwelling is compatible with forest uses. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. An expression of belief that a local code standard imposing a specific decibel limitation will not be violated is not an adequate finding of compliance with that standard. Expressions by the applicant's attorney that noise generated by the proposed use will not be excessive or violate the standard are not substantial evidence that the standard will be met. Weuster v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 425 (1993).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. A county does not improperly rely on unadopted, unofficial criteria where its findings make it sufficiently clear that the county is simply relying on material submitted by the Oregon Department of Forestry as expert testimony in determining whether a code "necessary for and accessory to" standard for approval of forest management dwellings is met. Lardy v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 567 (1993).

1.6.4 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Expert Testimony. Where a local decision maker relies on prior nonspecific and equivocal testimony concerning the location and presence of wetlands, in place of a well documented specific expert study, and adopts no findings explaining that choice, the challenged decision is not supported by substantial evidence. Reeder v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 583 (1992).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An affidavit of the owner of the subject property stating that a particular structure is removable does not establish, as a matter of law, that the structure is removable where photographs depict the structure as being located on the subject property during the rainy season over many years. Armstrong v. Jackson County, 81 Or LUBA 651 (2020).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a decision-maker relies on 40-foot contour maps in the record, sourced from county data, to determine the slopes on the subject property, an argument that the decision-maker erred by disregarding finer-scale, two-foot contour maps that petitioners submitted provides no basis for reversal or remand where the decision-maker reasoned that petitioners' contour maps were "not reliable, accurate or trustworthy evidence" because they were not signed by a registered professional surveyor and because they contained an incorrect scale, and where the petitioners have not otherwise established that credible evidence weighs overwhelmingly in favor of their description of the slopes on the subject property or that the evidence upon which the decision-maker did rely was not substantial evidence. Velasquez v. Jackson County, 80 Or LUBA 1 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a neighbor describes observing, from their living room view, minimal orchard, meadow, and garden-related activity on the property and, other than horses belonging to some of the owners of the property, never seeing any livestock or other animals on the property between 1970 and 2004, and where the neighbor subsequently reiterates that there was no farm use, such as cattle or crops, between 1978 and 1983 and that, during the 1980s, owners of the property kept their show horses on the property, a local government may reasonably conclude that the property was "not managed for three of the five calendar years preceding January 1, 1983, as part of a farm operation that produced $20,000 or more in annual gross income" for purposes of former ORS 197.247(1)(a) (1991), even where the record includes (1) aerial photos from 1979 and 1982, (2) a 1979 permit for a new barn, (3) a 1987 farm dwelling approval, and (4) testimony from other area residents contradicting the neighbor's testimony, where the record does not disclose the proximity of the other area residents' properties to the subject property or whether those area residents had made firsthand observations of the subject property during the relevant statutory period. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An attorney-land-use-consultant-prepared ESEE analysis including numerous plans, reports, and other documents supporting the redesignation and rezoning of protected habitat from forest land to marginal land under former ORS 197.247 (1991) is not sufficient to rebut expert testimony including (1) a letter authored by an ODFW biologist that generally discusses the cumulative impact of development on habitat and (2) general ODFW guidance related to levels of residential density in areas of peripheral big game habitat absent evidence of the attorney land use consultant's expertise. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. In the context of an application to change the comprehensive plan designation of property to Rural Residential Exception Area, where a comprehensive plan provision provides that "any new Rural Residential Exception Areas need to be justified through initiating a non-resource plan amendment and zone change by demonstrating that the property does not meet the definition of agricultural * * * land," a county correctly determines that an applicant satisfies that provision by producing copies of the county's adopted and acknowledged agricultural lands inventories, which do not include the property. Even where an opponent submits an NRCS soils map into the record, which the opponent argues shows the property's soils constitute agricultural lands, where the NRCS website that the opponent used to prepare the soils map includes a disclaimer regarding the large scale of mapping, stating that "[e]nlargement of maps beyond the scale of mapping can cause misunderstanding of the detail of mapping and accuracy of soil line placement," a reasonable decision-maker would rely on the inventories to conclude that the property is not agricultural land, and a reasonable decision-maker could determine that the NRCS soils map is less credible than the inventories. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 80 Or LUBA 252 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a city bureau manages the city's transportation system, including private uses in the city right-of-way, and where bureau staff have special expertise in the safe and efficient use of the right-of-way and various demands on streets, including traffic, parking, and loading, statements from the bureau (1) that studio apartments have lower turnover rates, less need for unloading large furniture, and, thus, less need for a loading space, and (2) that signed, infrequent on-street loading will not have a negative effect on the traffic safety or other transportation functions of the abutting right-of-way are evidence that would permit a reasonable person to find that an on-street loading space is adequate for a proposed studio apartment building's loading needs such that the development continues to meet the intended purpose of, and, therefore, qualifies for an adjustment to, an off-street loading space requirement, even where there is testimony in the record from an opponent of the development regarding anticipated negative congestion and safety impacts of off-street loading. NDNA v. City of Portland, 80 Or LUBA 269 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where an approved site plan indicates that a replacement dwelling will be sited on an adjacent property, but where the building permit for the replacement dwelling allows a replacement dwelling "in the same footprint as the original home," and where an ArcGIS map marked with distances and existing development indicate that the footprint of the original dwelling was located on the subject property, a conclusion that the subject property does not "include[] a dwelling" for purposes of forest template dwelling approval under ORS 215.750(4)(d) is not supported by substantial evidence. Bielefeld v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 480 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will not second-guess a decision-maker's choice between conflicting evidence, including expert testimony, so long as a reasonable person could decide as the decision-maker did. Fairmount Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 80 Or LUBA 551 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where an applicant proposes to occupy one guest apartment within an 18,000-square-foot dwelling while allowing the remainder of the dwelling and all of its amenities to be used by bed and breakfast guests, a county's conclusion that the bed and breakfast is not a "subordinate use" of the dwelling, and therefore not a home occupation, and that the applicant is not a "resident of the dwelling" is consistent with the plain meaning of the code language and is supported by substantial evidence in the record where there is evidence that the applicant "spends a couple of days a week" at a different home, and that the subject dwelling does not appear to be occupied when viewed from the road or neighboring properties, even though the applicant provides a copy of her driver's license that lists the subject dwelling. Lee v. Marion County, 79 Or LUBA 199 (2019).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A reasonable person could conclude, based on expert testimony, that the 14-foot paved width of the only access street is sufficient to ensure compliance with a planned unit development (PUD) approval standard requiring that the PUD is not an "impediment to emergency response," where there is evidence that with adjoining paved or graveled parking areas to allow opposing traffic to pull over, the access street could allow emergency vehicle access in the same manner as a "queuing street," notwithstanding that the access street does not possess all the characteristics of a queuing street. Conte v. City of Eugene, 77 Or LUBA 69 (2018).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Whether an individual "appeared" during the proceedings below and thus has standing to appeal or intervene before LUBA is a mixed question of law and fact that often requires extra-record evidence to evaluate, including the circumstances surrounding whatever action is the basis for the asserted appearance. Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A hearings officer's conclusion that the subject property was "lawfully created" is supported by substantial evidence in the record that includes (1) a set of receipts for 1980 recording fees for the final partition plat for submittal of a survey, (2) a set of 1980 recorded deeds, and (3) the recorded final partition plat, despite the fact that the final partition plat was not recorded until 1996, where a reasonable person could rely on that evidence to conclude the subject property was created in conformance with all applicable ordinances. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 75 Or LUBA 151 (2017).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Adequate findings must (1) identify the relevant approval standards, (2) set out the facts which are believed and relied upon, and (3) explain how those facts lead to the conclusion that the approval standards are met; but adequate findings need not necessarily address evidence that conflicts with the evidence the local government chooses to rely upon, or explain why the decision-maker chose not to rely upon evidence that conflicts with the evidence it did choose to rely upon. Kine v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 419 (2017).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a hearings officer finds that the only evidence on a key legal issue regarding required mitigation for the impacts of a destination resort was presented by permit opponents, but the record makes it clear that the applicant also submitted conflicting evidence on that legal issue, remand is required. Central Land and Cattle Company, LLC v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 326 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will affirm a county's finding that a high-voltage line that effectively divides a property into thirds is a condition "unique to the property" justifying a variance to a minimum parcel size, where there is no argument or evidence that nearby properties are similarly divided by the high-voltage line. Neil v. Columbia County, 74 Or LUBA 442 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An applicant's letter detailing the nature and location of a concrete batch plant's fuel tanks, stockpiles and buildings is not sufficient to establish their location as a matter of law or to establish that a hearings officer erred by failing to rely on that letter, where the hearings officer pointed out discrepancies between that letter and other letters submitted by the applicant. Meyer v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 1 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where there is conflicting believable evidence regarding whether a proposal to replace a concrete batch plant with an asphalt batch plant would present a greater risk of explosions and damage to surrounding properties, a hearings officer's conclusion that the asphalt batch plant poses a greater risk of explosions and damage is supported by substantial evidence. Meyer v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 1 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A reasonable decision-maker could infer from the lack of any mention of composting on the subject property in any contemporaneous documentation prior to the 1990s that composting did not occur on the property prior to the period, notwithstanding conflicting testimony from the applicant that composting occurred prior to 1962, the date a composting facility became nonconforming on the property. Grabhorn v. Washington County, 73 Or LUBA 27 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A landscape architect's conclusory statement that a proposed buffer will "ensure compatibility" between urban and rural agricultural uses is not supported by an adequate factual base, where the record includes uncontroverted testimony that the buffer depends on vegetation growth that will take up to 15 years to effectively screen equestrian jumping events located only 50 feet away from urban residential development, and that horses participating in the events may be panicked by fireworks and other sudden visual and auditory impacts stemming from the unscreened residential uses. Forest Park Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 73 Or LUBA 193 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An exhibit prepared by the applicant's attorney showing that three equestrian centers are located within urban areas does not provide an adequate factual base to support a finding that a 50-foot-wide buffer is sufficient to ensure compatibility between urban residential uses and an adjacent equestrian center, where that testimony is undermined by testimony from the owners of the urban equestrian centers that their operations rely on buffers that are 160 to 300 feet wide, and that a buffer only 50 feet wide would compromise the safety of horse riders. Forest Park Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 73 Or LUBA 193 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The lack of evidentiary support for a finding that a vegetative buffer is superior to a distance buffer at reducing visual incompatibilities is not harmless error, where the only evidence on that point is to the contrary, and under the local government's interpretation of the compatibility standard whether one buffer method is better at reducing or minimizing adverse visual impacts than another method appears to be a legitimate consideration. Forest Park Neighborhood Assoc. v. Washington County, 73 Or LUBA 193 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A reasonable decision-maker could rely upon a diesel fume test conducted by the applicant to determine whether diesel fumes are detectable at the property line, combined with a condition of approval limiting idling and operation within 60 feet of the property line, to conclude that a "no fume detection" home occupation standard is met, notwithstanding conflicting anecdotal testimony from the neighbors across the road that they can sometimes detect diesel fumes. Jacobs v. Clackamas County, 73 Or LUBA 262 (2016).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where OAR 660-023-0180 sets a default maximum mining impact area of 1500 feet, and the county employed an impact area of one-half mile and relied on testimony from the operator of a nearby cattle operation and a second person with experience with mining impacts on cattle in other locations to conclude that the one-half-mile impact area did not need to be extended based on potential mining noise impacts on cattle, the county's decision that the one-half-mile impact area need not be extended is supported by substantial evidence. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 72 Or LUBA 45 (2015).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the record includes only speculative testimony that mining would impact sage grouse causing them to relocate and conflict with grazing operations beyond the proposed one-half-mile mining impact area, thus justifying a larger impact area, a county finding that mining would neither impact sage grouse nor cause them to relocate nor result in conflicts with distant farming operations is supported by substantial evidence, where the record includes testimony from the manager of a nearby grazing operation that there were no nearby sage grouse and the proposed mine would not have any impacts on grazing. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 72 Or LUBA 45 (2015).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. While the evaluation of impacts on estuarine resources required by Goal 16, Implementation Requirement 1 need not be prepared by an expert, the nature of some types of potential adverse impacts caused by development on estuarine resources may be such that some technical expertise is necessary to provide substantial evidence to support conclusions based on the evaluation. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the record includes expert testimony that residential development may adversely impact endangered salmon species in an adjacent estuary through pollution from stormwater runoff, some level of scientific or professional expertise is necessary to rebut that testimony in order to provide supporting evidence for a contrary conclusion. A letter from the applicant's attorney opining that stormwater runoff will not adversely impact salmon is not substantial evidence to support that conclusion. Oregon Coast Alliance v. City of Brookings, 72 Or LUBA 222 (2015).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A county errs in applying a rigorous "compelling evidence" standard to evaluate testimony from farmers located more than one mile from a proposed landfill, regarding impacts of the landfill operation on their farm costs and practices. Nothing in ORS 215.296(1) suggests that a county can apply different evidentiary standards on different parties based on the geographic distance to the proposed non-farm use. Stop the Dump Coalition v. Yamhill County, 72 Or LUBA 341 (2015).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. In comparing uses across different zoning districts for purposes of determining whether a rezone "significantly affects" a transportation facility under the Transportation Planning Rule (TPR), consistent assumptions must be used, with the only variables reflecting the different zoning standards. Where the opposition traffic expert used different assumptions about development under the original zone and the new zone that are not based on the differences between the two zones, that testimony does not undermine reliance on the applicant's expert's conclusion that the new zone does not allow more traffic-intensive uses than the old zone. Save Downtown Canby v. City of Canby, 70 Or LUBA 68 (2014).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where findings explain that a 1996 flood destroyed some county permit records, but staff testifies that the flood did not destroy older building permit records because the older records were stored above the flood damage area, substantial evidence exists to support the finding that the county permit records are complete through that period, as well as the inference that the absence of a building permit for a second dwelling means that the dwelling was constructed without a building permit approval, and therefore was not lawfully established. Macfarlane v. Clackamas County, 70 Or LUBA 126 (2014).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where, based on Natural Resources Conservation Service data, opponents take the position that the water table lies two feet below the surface of a proposed topsoil mining operation, but the local government accepts the applicant's position that the water table lies 125 feet below the surface, but no party identifies the evidence the applicant and local government relied on for the 125-foot estimate, LUBA will remand the decision so that the county can adopt findings explaining the large discrepancy in the two estimates and why it accepted the 125-foot estimate. Tolbert v. Clackamas County, 70 Or LUBA 388 (2014).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A city's finding that a historic resource is not capable of generating a reasonable economic return is supported by substantial evidence, where the applicant submitted detailed studies showing that the cost of rehabilitating the structure to meet current building codes would far exceed the reasonable rental value, notwithstanding conflicting testimony by opponents that rehabilitation costs could be lower, and rental returns higher, than the applicant's experts estimated. Rushing v. City of Salem, 70 Or LUBA 448 (2014).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The city has discretion to rely on the evidence it chooses in making its decision, and the city's decision not to rely on evidence provided by an applicant that calculates slopes on a property using a method that differs from the method requested by the city is not a basis to reverse or remand the decision. SE Neighbors Neighborhood Assoc. v. City of Eugene, 68 Or LUBA 51 (2013).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a hearings official is faced with testimony from one expert that a proposal's sewage effluent would be residential strength and from another expert that the proposal's effluent would be greater than residential strength, and both experts' testimony is believable, the choice of which expert to believe lies with the hearings official. Teen Challenge v. Lane County, 67 Or LUBA 300 (2013).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will not second guess a land use decision maker's choice between conflicting expert testimony, so long as it appears to LUBA that a reasonable person could decide as the decision maker did based on all of the evidence in the record. Willamette Oaks, LLC v. City of Eugene, 67 Or LUBA 351 (2013).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a hearings officer specifically recognizes that there is conflicting expert testimony and the expert testimony he finds more persuasive is believable, his decision is supported by substantial evidence. Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the local government recognizes that there is conflicting expert testimony and the expert testimony the local government finds more persuasive is believable, the decision is supported by substantial evidence. Protect Grand Island Farms v. Yamhill County, 64 Or LUBA 179 (2011).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where DEQ rules require that septic drain fields must be set back at least 100 yards from wells and there is conflicting substantial evidence regarding the existence of an old well in an area proposed for a septic drain field, LUBA will defer to a hearings official's decision that has the effect of allowing the drain field to be used as proposed. Freedman v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 309 (2011).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a decision maker is required to conduct a de novo review of the evidence in the record, but the decision maker erroneously believes that under the appropriate standard of review the decision maker is obligated to resolve all evidentiary conflicts in the applicant's favor absent overwhelming conflicting evidence, a decision based on that erroneous understanding would likely not constitute de novo review. Citizens Against LNG v. Coos County, 63 Or LUBA 162 (2011).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A finding expressing an erroneous understanding of the local decision-maker's standard of evidentiary review is harmless error at best, where no party identifies any findings addressing the approval criteria or evidence in which the decision-maker applied that erroneous standard of review. Citizens Against LNG v. Coos County, 63 Or LUBA 162 (2011).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the critical finding in a hearings officer's decision in a code enforcement proceeding is that petitioner had a longstanding regular practice of mowing grass and blackberry bushes in the riparian zone on his property, the only evidence that supports that finding is the testimony of the code enforcement officer based on field notes regarding conversations he had with petitioner that are not part of the record, petitioner testifies in the hearings before the hearings officer that he mowed in the riparian area on only one occasion, and it is not clear that the hearings officer even recognized that the testimony of petitioner and the code enforcement officer conflicted on the critical issue, remand is required. The hearings officer may be able to explain why he believed the code enforcement officer over petitioner, but without any explanation his decision is not supported by substantial evidence. Wigen v. Jackson County, 63 Or LUBA 490 (2011).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Substantial evidence supports a county's finding that alternative sites not requiring an exception cannot accommodate a proposed travel plaza, where the record indicates that limited access to the alternative sites precludes use by large trucks. A county does not err in determining reasonable access by large trucks to be a essential or necessary characteristic of a proposed travel plaza. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the opponents' traffic engineer testifies based on data in the record that a left turn lane is required to ensure that the proposed use complies with a local transportation standard, and the applicant's traffic engineer disagrees, but without citing any evidence or explaining the basis for the contrary opinion, the applicant's engineer's unsupported opinion is not substantial evidence demonstrating compliance with the standard. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Remand is necessary where the applicant's traffic engineer declines to consider the impact of large spectator events at an already approved speedway near the proposed travel plaza, because the speedway events would "overwhelm" the local transportation system, without explaining why those impacts can be ignored in evaluating whether the local transportation system has the "carrying capacity" to handle traffic from the proposed travel plaza. Devin Oil Co., Inc. v. Morrow County, 62 Or LUBA 247 (2010).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. That there is conflicting evidence in the record regarding whether an existing cell tower has capacity for co-locating the applicant's cellular antennas is not a basis for reversal or remand, where the decision maker could reasonably conclude based on substantial evidence in the record that the existing tower does not have capacity. Oberdorfer v. Deschutes County, 62 Or LUBA 296 (2010).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. When a traffic impact analysis (TIA) states that it was based on ODOT recommended guidelines but fails to follow those ODOT guidelines, and the final decision relies on that TIA and does not respond to opponents' challenges to the failure to comply with the ODOT guidelines, the decision to rely on a TIA is not reasonable and the decision is not supported by substantial evidence. Citizens for Responsible Development v. City of The Dalles, 60 Or LUBA 12 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the petitioner fails to challenge findings that explain why the county chose to rely on a consultant's report that estimates the costs of putting land to farm use based on certain assumptions, the petitioner's evidentiary arguments that the county should have used other assumptions fails to establish that the report is flawed or that the county erred in relying on the report. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 60 Or LUBA 131 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. When nearby ranchers submit evidence that conflicts with the applicant's expert testimony regarding whether the property could be used in conjunction with other land for farm use, even though that evidence could constitute substantial evidence, the county was entitled to rely on the conflicting evidence submitted by the applicant's expert. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 60 Or LUBA 131 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A hearings officer does not err in rejecting as not credible testimony that a 19-acre farm produced over $80,000 in revenue from hay grown on the property, where the applicant provided no evidence of how much hay was grown on the property, or documentation distinguishing revenue from the sale of hay grown on the property from revenue derived from the resale of $83,000 in hay that the applicant purchased that year, and substantial evidence in the record indicated that to derive $80,000 in revenue solely from hay grown on the property would mean the applicant achieved yields and prices several times higher than average for the county. Chapman v. Marion County, 60 Or LUBA 377 (2010).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. When determining what comprehensive plan designation is more appropriate, a local government may consider evidence regarding wildlife habitat protection, recreation, need for parkland, water quality preservation, noise and air pollution, and tree preservation with respect to the entire property at issue in deciding that open space is the proper designation. The consideration is not limited to inventoried habitat and riparian areas. Haertl Development Company v. City of Portland, 59 Or LUBA 69 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where Metro has designated 308 acres next to a city for industrial development, a market analysis is not substantial evidence that those 308 acres are not needed to meet the 20-year regional need for industrial land, where that market analysis concludes that under the right economic conditions only 150 acres of 308 acres will be developed but also concludes that there is a current shortage of industrial land to meet the region's 20-year need for industrial land. Graser-Lindsey v. City of Oregon City, 59 Or LUBA 388 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Although a local government land use decision maker is entitled to choose between conflicting believable expert testimony, where the decision maker does not demonstrate that it recognized the conflicting expert testimony and chose to believe one expert's testimony rather than the other expert's testimony, remand is required. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the record includes conflicting believable evidence about whether an applicant's assumption that 90 percent of the groundwater withdrawn for use by a destination resort will be returned to the subsurface hydrologic system and the county hearings officer findings recognize the conflicting evidence but choose to rely on the applicant's expert's position, which had been accepted by the Oregon Water Resources Department, the hearings officer's findings on that question are supported by substantial evidence. Gould v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 435 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A county reasonably concludes that the record does not include "factual information indicating significant potential conflicts" with respect to whether a proposed quarry will disrupt sage grouse flights to and from a protected breeding site, where the only evidence suggesting that grouse flights come near the quarry site is a map the significance of which is subject to conflicting expert testimony. Walker v. Deschutes County, 59 Or LUBA 488 (2009).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Arguments that merely cite to opposing testimony and contend that that testimony should be believed over the evidence the local government chose to rely upon are insufficient to demonstrate that the decision is not supported by substantial evidence. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 56 Or LUBA 240 (2008).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A county errs in relying on testimony of a general well constructor to conclude that digging 32 new wells would not adversely affect the underlying aquifer, where (1) the constructor's testimony is based on the current functioning of three wells in the area and does not address the impacts of 32 new wells, (20 the constructor provided no water budget for the aquifer or similar data, and (3) the opponents submitted a detailed study and water budget from an acknowledged aquifer expert who testified that 32 new wells would adversely impact the aquifer. Gardener v. Marion County, 56 Or LUBA 583 (2008).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The existence of conflicting evidence in the record regarding whether an existing structure within a setback is 7.5 feet or one foot from the property boundary is not a basis for remand, as long as the city's choice between the conflicting evidence is one a reasonable person could make. McConnell v. City of Grants Pass, 55 Or LUBA 280 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. While an astronomer's testimony regarding the impact of dust on an observatory's telescopes is substantial evidence from which a reasonable decision maker could conclude that dust from an open-pit mining operation would significantly conflict with the observatory, the county could nonetheless rely on the distance between the site and the observatory and proposed measures to control dust to conclude that the mine would not significantly conflict with the observatory. Walker v. Deschutes County, 55 Or LUBA 93 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Expert testimony that an existing firearms training facility in a forest zone is a fire hazard and increases costs and risks of fire suppression is not sufficient to undermine a finding to the contrary, where the testimony is based on the operation of the facility as a whole, and not on the post-1995 improvements that are the subject of the application. Citizens for Responsibility v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 1 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will affirm the hearings officer's choice to rely on a traffic model that has not been "calibrated" against real-world data, where the applicable guidelines stress the importance of calibration but do not state that calibration is the only way to ensure that the model is accurate, and the applicant's expert testifies that the model is reliable notwithstanding the absence of calibration. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Gresham, 54 Or LUBA 16 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. To obtain remand of development approval based on evidentiary grounds, it is insufficient to simply cite the evidence that the hearings officer rejected and argue that the evidence undermines the hearings officer's ultimate evidentiary choice. The petitioner must also challenge and establish error in the findings in which the hearings officer explained why he found petitioner's evidence unreliable. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Gresham, 54 Or LUBA 16 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A finding that it is feasible to construct a driveway that complies with maximum finished grade standards is not supported by substantial evidence, where the proposed driveway alignment clearly does not comply, the applicant's engineer stated generally that an alternate alignment is likely to meet grade standards but submitted no plans or drawings demonstrating the location or feasibility of that alignment, and the opponents' engineer submitted detailed testimony supported by drawings showing that the suggested alternate alignment will not comply. Lenox v. Jackson County, 54 Or LUBA 272 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where an approval criterion for an adjustment to the size of required loading spaces requires that the adjustment not negatively affect traffic safety or other transportation features, the mere fact that there might be some moving or delivery vehicles that will not fit into the adjusted spaces that could have fit into the unadjusted spaces does not compel the conclusion that the approval criterion is not satisfied. Yun v. City of Portland, 54 Or LUBA 564 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A county reasonably relies on a forester's opinion that Ponderosa pine is a more valuable species to grow on certain soils than Douglas fir, over conflicting opinions by persons who are not soil or forestry experts. Anderson v. Lane County, 54 Or LUBA 669 (2007).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. In determining whether a property is generally unsuitable for the production of farm crops and livestock or merchantable tree species, a county's conclusion that any historic agricultural use on the property before that time does not provide a substantial hurdle is supported by substantial evidence where the county chooses to rely on an expert's opinion that proposed nonfarm parcels have not been used for agricultural operation in the past 20 years. Peterson v. Crook County, 52 Or LUBA 160 (2006).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. It is not unreasonable for a local decision maker to cite issues raised regarding the evidence submitted by an applicant's engineers that were not responded to, and to rely on opponents' experts' testimony to find that the applicant failed to carry its burden of proof. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. City of Bend, 52 Or LUBA 261 (2006).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A local government may rely on evidence that clam beds that partially justified a previous natural management unit designation have been smothered by erosion, and the reduced habitat value warrants redesignation of the area to a conservation management unit, notwithstanding conflicting evidence over the remaining habitat value. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. Lane County, 52 Or LUBA 471 (2006).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where an applicant's expert and the United States Fish and Wildlife Service disagree about the adequacy of the expert's survey of endangered western lilies on the site of a proposed development, LUBA will defer to the city's choice to believe the applicant's expert. While the United States Fish and Wildlife Service may ultimately prevail in future federal permitting proceedings, a city's choice between conflicting testimony at the city's master plan of development approval stage presents no basis for reversal or remand. Oregon Shores Cons. Coalition v. City of Brookings, 49 Or LUBA 273 (2005).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An expert study concluding that a clay layer prevents rainwater from permeating down to the aquifer and that proposed storm water facilities will ensure that post-development hydrology differs little from pre-development hydrology is substantial evidence a reasonable person could rely upon to conclude that proposed development will not adversely affect the aquifer or wells that rely on it. Dinges v. City of Oregon City, 49 Or LUBA 376 (2005).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Even if intersection improvements that are required in approving a destination resort will maintain acceptable levels of service on nearby roads and key intersections, it does not necessarily follow that there will not be conflicts between the increased levels of traffic the proposed destination resort will generate on these roads and agricultural traffic (including livestock and large slow-moving agricultural vehicles) seeking to negotiate these same roads. However, where the relevant approval standard only requires "reasonable compatibility," and the testimony on both sides of the seriousness of the conflicts from such traffic is speculative, LUBA cannot say the county was unreasonable in finding the destination resort will be "reasonably compatible" with nearby farm use and farm traffic. Burke v. Crook County, 48 Or LUBA 23 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A local government may rely on portions of two conflicting expert studies of soil classifications, although explanatory findings may be necessary to identify what portions are relied upon, and to resolve any differences or contradictions between the studies relied upon, so that LUBA may perform its review function. Doob v. Josephine County, 48 Or LUBA 227 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Expert evidence that an enhanced wetland is very unlikely to attract species that would conflict with operation of an adjoining aggregate mine is substantial evidence to support a finding that the enhanced wetlands will not "adversely impact" the mine, notwithstanding conflicting evidence on that point and the fact that the applicant's expert could not guarantee no adverse impacts. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A code standard requiring that a proposed use will not interfere with or cause an adverse impact on a mining operation does not require evidence that adverse impacts are impossible; rather, it requires the decision maker to evaluate probabilities. Expert evidence that it is "highly unlikely" that wetland enhancements will attract species that might lead to restrictions on a mining operation is evidence a reasonable person could rely on to find compliance with the adverse impacts standard, notwithstanding conflicting expert evidence on that point. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where LUBA concludes that the evidence in the local government record regarding whether use of a nonconforming dwelling was abandoned for more than one year was "hardly overwhelming" but was nevertheless such that a reasonable decision maker could either find that the use was discontinued or find that the use was not discontinued, the hearings officer's finding that the nonconforming use was discontinued is supported by substantial evidence. Bradley v. Washington County, 47 Or LUBA 11 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where LUBA is able to determine that a reasonable decision maker could rely on the evidence the decision maker chose to rely on, findings specifically addressing conflicting evidence are unnecessary. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A surveyor's map that shows elevation differences at certain points on the subject property, but does not provide a basis to estimate whether the slope of the property is predominantly more or less than seven percent, does not so undermine a small-scale county soil survey map indicating that the soil slope on the subject property is predominantly greater than seven percent, as to render the county soil survey nonsubstantial evidence. Tallman v. Clatsop County, 47 Or LUBA 240 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A finding that sales of non-construction related materials at a home improvement store, such as house plants, barbeques, etc., are incidental and subordinate to the primary use of "Construction Sales and Services" is supported by substantial evidence, where the testimony cited by petitioners takes a broader view of what constitutes non-construction related material that the local decision maker and in any case fails to establish that the sales of such non-construction related materials is so predominant as to make such sales the principal use. Heilman v. City of Corvallis, 47 Or LUBA 305 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where two traffic studies indicate that post-acknowledgment plan amendments may cause a transportation facility to fall below the minimum acceptable performance standard, and the respondent cites no evidence to the contrary that a reasonable person would rely upon, remand is necessary for the city to address whether the plan amendment will "significantly affect" that transportation facility within the meaning of OAR 660-012-0060(2)(d). NWDA v. City of Portland, 47 Or LUBA 533 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where there is conflicting believable expert testimony regarding the efficacy of a subdivision applicant's proposed measures to ensure that construction of a road near large trees with intertwined roots can be accomplished without so damaging the roots that the trees will die, LUBA will defer to the city's choice of which expert to believe. Miller v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 536 (2004).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Substantial evidence supports a hearings officer's conclusion that only five percent of traffic generated by a proposed church would turn south at an affected intersection, and that traffic counts performed in February are indicative of summer peak traffic loads, where it is undisputed that few if any church members reside south of the intersection, and the applicant's traffic engineer testified that the affected intersection is not subject to seasonal fluctuations in traffic levels. Noble v. Clackamas County, 45 Or LUBA 366 (2003).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A reasonable decision maker may rely upon existing state and federal safety standards, and evidence of safety features designed to prevent fire or explosion in the event an airplane crashes into a proposed fuel station located near a runway, to conclude that no additional safety standards are necessary, notwithstanding testimony from the airport manager and aviation officials that the location of the proposed station is unsafe. Graham Oil Co. v. City of North Bend, 44 Or LUBA 18 (2003).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where petitioners present evidence and testimony that a property is not predominately composed of Class IV through Class VIII soils because an access easement that covers over 25 percent of the property is not wholly comprised of Class VI soils, and the testimony of the applicant's soil scientist does not explain why the entire easement is comprised of Class VI soils, the county's determination that the property is predominately composed of Class IV through VIII soils is not supported by substantial evidence. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 44 Or LUBA 777 (2003).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A city is entitled to rely on expert testimony that a specific model of the flood depth and velocity over the subject property is necessary to demonstrate compliance with a standard requiring no significant hazard to life or property, and the city may decline to extrapolate that information from other expert testimony that models an adjacent area. Starks Landing, Inc. v. City of Rivergrove, 43 Or LUBA 237 (2002).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A county decision the relies on an engineer's report to identify the location of a floodway boundary is supported by substantial evidence, where the county does not require that a land surveyor locate the floodway boundary and the conflicting evidence that supports a different location for the boundary is not so compelling as to cause a reasonable person to doubt the credibility of the engineer's report. Mertz v. Clackamas County, 43 Or LUBA 313 (2002).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. In determining whether conflicting uses can be minimized pursuant to OAR 660-023-0180(4), a local government may draw reasonable inferences from expert testimony to determine that a numerical standard for minimization, such as for turbidity, cannot be satisfied. Molalla River Reserve, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 251 (2002).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Petitioner fails to overcome the county's determination that property is forest land under Goal 4, and fails to demonstrate as a matter of law that land is not "suitable for commercial forest uses," where petitioner's own expert testifies that notwithstanding limitations on productivity the subject property is in a "medium productivity range" and would yield $81,300 worth of commercial timber at 50 years, after an investment of $7,450. Potts v. Clackamas County, 42 Or LUBA 1 (2002).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Although local governments are required to address legitimate issues that are raised in a quasi-judicial land use proceeding concerning relevant approval criteria, local governments are not required to address in their findings every conflict in the evidence or every criticism that is made of particular evidence. Knight v. City of Eugene, 41 Or LUBA 279 (2002).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Substantial evidence supports a finding that a proposed high school will not increase traffic through an affected intersection during the peak morning hour, notwithstanding failure of the traffic study to take certain trips into account, where the decision imposes conditions that effectively eliminate the possibility of those trips impacting the intersection. Friends of Collins View v. City of Portland, 41 Or LUBA 261 (2002).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A reasonable person could conclude that revenue projections for an urban renewal plan are feasible for purposes of ORS 457.095(6) and 457.085(3)(g), where expert evidence in the record shows that the total debt can be retired if four new industrial developments locate in the industrial park improved under the renewal plan, that three new industrial developments have advanced plans to locate in the park, and that the park, once improved, is likely to attract at least one other new industrial development over the relevant time period. Zimmerman v. Columbia County, 40 Or LUBA 483 (2001).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where nearly all the evidence in the record concerning potential groundwater pollution associated with a proposed aggregate mine is speculative and would support opposite conclusions concerning that potential, the local government's selection of which evidence to believe is reasonable. Donnell v. Union County, 40 Or LUBA 455 (2001).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An architect's unsupported statement that a proposed structure is 14,719 square feet in size and thus complies with a local standard limiting permissible size to 14,723 square feet is not substantial evidence supporting a finding of compliance with the standard, where the opponents offered detailed evidence showing that the structure exceeds the maximum size and the applicant failed to either explain the architect's supporting calculations or refute the opposing evidence. Weaver v. Linn County, 40 Or LUBA 203 (2001).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Expert testimony that existing riprap will prevent dune retreat if repaired when damaged is substantial evidence supporting the county's finding under Goal 18 that the dune upon which development is proposed is stabilized and not subject to wave overtopping or ocean undercutting, notwithstanding conflicting expert evidence that the riprap may be insufficient or may fail. Save Oregon's Cape Kiwanda v. Tillamook County, 40 Or LUBA 143 (2001).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A determination by a hearings officer that, based on conflicting testimony and evidence, the impacts from a proposed alteration to a nonconforming use would be greater than the allowed nonconforming use does not allow opponents to "effectively veto" the alteration, where the decision identifies the evidence considered by the hearings officer and articulates the reasons why the hearings officer found certain testimony more credible than other testimony. Hal's Construction, Inc. v. Clackamas County, 39 Or LUBA 616 (2001).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A city's finding that all fill that had been placed in an estuary had been removed is supported by substantial evidence where the city relied on testimony by the applicant's engineer, a letter from the Corps of Engineers and other evidence of delivery and removal of fill, notwithstanding certain weaknesses in that evidence and the existence of other conflicting evidence. Willhoft v. City of Gold Beach, 39 Or LUBA 353 (2001).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The burden of proof to show the legitimacy of a nonconforming use rests with the party asserting the existence of the use. LUBA will not substitute its judgment for that of the local decision maker where a reasonable person could find a beach house is not a valid nonconforming use. Crook v. Curry County, 38 Or LUBA 677 (2000).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Evidence that alternatives to the preferred option require a sewer connection to a different drainage basin, a pump station contrary to applicable regulations and the removal of mature trees, and that they are significantly more expensive to install, demonstrates that the alternatives are impracticable. Malinowski Farm v. Metro, 38 Or LUBA 633 (2000).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Neighboring farmer's testimony regarding potential for goose depredation of crops is substantial evidence that impacts from mining will not substantially increase the cost of or force a significant change in agricultural practices, notwithstanding contrary general statements from a government wildlife biologist. Stockwell v. Benton County, 38 Or LUBA 621 (2000).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A title insurance company letter indicating that a property has legal access is substantial evidence that such access exists, notwithstanding contrary evidence in the record. Dierking v. Clackamas County, 38 Or LUBA 106 (2000).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A city's conclusion that additional parking is needed is supported by substantial evidence notwithstanding contrary evidence contained within a parking study, where the city found the parking study is limited in scope and does not account for certain variables, and there is also evidence that parking is unavailable during peak times and that persons avoid a particular store because of a perceived lack of parking. Douglas v. City of Lake Oswego, 37 Or LUBA 826 (2000).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will affirm a hearings officer's choice between conflicting expert testimony where a reasonable person could conclude, based on the testimony of applicant's expert, that a proposed intersection provides a sight distance exceeding that required by the code, notwithstanding the contrary testimony of opponents' engineer. Mitchell v. Washington County, 37 Or LUBA 452 (2000).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where an applicant submits evidence that an intersection will operate at level of service C but later submits evidence showing the intersection will operate at level of service E, a finding that the intersection will operate at level of service C is not supported by substantial evidence. Where the finding concerning the intersection is a necessary part of the decision, the decision must be remanded. Turner Community Association v. Marion County, 37 Or LUBA 324 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A property owner's explanation that required plowing and cultivation occurred at the time Christmas trees were planted is substantial evidence that required plowing and cultivation occurred, where the only contrary evidence is opponents' unsupported expressions of doubt that the required plowing and cultivation occurred. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A city's denial of a permit to construct a house proposed to be cantilevered out over the face of a sand bluff is supported by substantial evidence, where there is conflicting expert testimony regarding adverse impacts from structural supports sunk into the face of the bluff, and the city reasonably chose to believe an expert opinion that under no circumstances should the face of the bluff be compromised. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 37 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Neighbors' testimony regarding adverse impacts of vibration from construction on the integrity of a sand bluff underlying adjacent properties is substantial evidence supporting the city's denial of a house proposed to be built on the bluff, notwithstanding a contrary conclusion inferred from geotechnical reports supporting the application. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 37 Or LUBA 1 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where all the testimony regarding whether students would or would not continue current parking behavior in the future is based on unsupported speculation about what might happen in the future, a reasonable decision maker could choose either the proponent's or the opponent's testimony. Baughman v. City of Portland, 36 Or LUBA 353 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Substantial evidence supports a city's finding that the primary purpose of a proposed facility is to recover recyclables from a waste stream, where there is evidence that the most significant function and justification of the proposed facility is to recover recyclables, notwithstanding that the proposed facility might also serve or facilitate other economic purposes. Sequoia Park Condo. Assoc. v. City of Beaverton, 36 Or LUBA 317 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A hearings officer's findings which rely on the absence of business records and the testimony of a neighbor to conclude that a nonconforming use was discontinued are supported by substantial evidence, where the findings address the conflicting evidence submitted by the applicant and explain why that evidence did not establish the continued existence of the nonconforming use. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 36 Or LUBA 273 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. An assignment of error criticizing a city council for not discussing conflicting evidence will be rejected, because it is the written decision rather than oral deliberations where the decision maker is required to explain its choice between conflicting evidence. Moreover, where LUBA can determine that a reasonable decision maker would rely on the evidence the decision maker relied on, findings specifically addressing the conflicting evidence are not necessary. Port Dock Four, Inc. v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 68 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA does not independently analyze the evidence, but reviews evidence in the record solely to determine whether it was reasonable for the decision maker to rely on that evidence in making a decision. Where the written evidence is conflicting and a video tape makes it clear that only small remnants of past farming or Christmas tree growing efforts on the subject property remain among the piles of debris that have been scattered over the subject property, it is reasonable for a hearings officer to conclude there is no current farm use of the property. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA does not duplicate the role of a local hearings officer. Where the evidence is conflicting such that a reasonable decision maker could reach different conclusions based on that evidence, the choice of which evidence to believe and which conclusion to reach is for the hearings officer. River City Disposal v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 360 (1998).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A local government's decision regarding the scope of an alleged nonconforming use is supported by substantial evidence, where the evidence the local government relies on is credible, and the opposing evidence does not so undermine the evidence relied upon as to render the local government's reliance on supporting evidence unreasonable. Aman v. City of Tigard, 35 Or LUBA 353 (1998).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where findings identify substantial evidence to support a local government's position, the government is not required to explain why it chose to balance conflicting evidence in a particular way or to identify evidence it chose not to rely upon. Sanders v. Yamhill County, 34 Or LUBA 69 (1998).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where there is a dispute between expert opinions, a local government is entitled to choose between conflicting evidence, provided that opposing testimony and other evidence in the record do not undermine the government's evidence to the extent that no reasonable person would rely on it. ODOT v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 57 (1998).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Selected portions of an engineer's letter, cited to support a finding that water supply is adequate, do not constitute substantial evidence where that finding is undermined by the engineer's letter taken as a whole and by other conflicting evidence. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 33 Or LUBA 225 (1997).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will defer to a local government's choice between conflicting evidence if it concludes a reasonable person would have reached the decision the local government made in view of all of the evidence in the record. Tigard Sand and Gravel v. Clackamas County, 33 Or LUBA 124 (1997).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Population projections of a witness who is not shown to be qualified by education or experience to evaluate evidence and draw conclusions concerning a highly technical and complex subject raise substantial evidence concerns, particularly when they are contradicted by the official population estimates prepared by the Center for Population Research and Census (CPRC) and letters from CPRC experts. Concerned Citizens v. Jackson County, 33 Or LUBA 70 (1997).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Although the choice between conflicting testimony belongs to the county, where the evidence provided by petitioners reveals factual inconsistencies in intervenors' evidence, the county must at least explain a reasonable basis for its choice between the conflicting evidence. Le Roux v. Malheur County, 32 Or LUBA 124 (1996).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the county's factual findings determine that the subject parcel contains soils that are presumptively suitable for farm use, but then conclude that the proposed dwelling is situated on land that is unsuitable for farm use, the county's conclusion is not supported by substantial evidence in the record. Le Roux v. Malheur County, 32 Or LUBA 124 (1996).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the county's conclusion that two parcels are not contiguous for purposes of OAR 660-04-028(6)(c)(B) is not factually established in the record and is inconsistent with evidence relied upon by the county regarding nonresource use on adjacent parcels, the county's finding is not supported by substantial evidence in the record. Johnson v. Lane County, 31 Or LUBA 454 (1996).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will not substitute its judgment for that of the local decision maker. Without references to conflicting evidence in the record that so undermines the evidence upon which the county based its conclusion as to compel a conclusion that a reasonable person could not have reached the county's conclusion, LUBA will not find the county's findings lack substantial evidence. Canfield v. Yamhill County, 31 Or LUBA 25 (1996).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The county is not required to address all conflicting evidence in its findings, but the findings must address and respond to specific issues raised in the local proceedings that are relevant to compliance with approval standards. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 302 (1996).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the evidence is conflicting, if a reasonable person could reach the decision made by the local government in view of all the evidence in the record, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between the conflicting evidence, notwithstanding that reasonable people could draw different conclusions from the evidence. Canby Quality of Life Committee v. City of Canby, 30 Or LUBA 166 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA does not substitute its judgment regarding conflicting evidence in the record for that of the local government. If a reasonable person could reach the decision made by the local government, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between conflicting evidence. Gionet v. City of Tualatin, 30 Or LUBA 96 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where evidence in the record supports the city's finding that a development site is not capable of supporting an 11-lot subdivision, LUBA will defer to the city's evaluation of the evidence, notwithstanding petitioner's citation to contrary evidence in the record that the site could accommodate 11 units. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 30 Or LUBA 85 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Petitioners' disagreement with a local government's evaluation of conflicting evidence is not a basis for remand; where different reasonable conclusions can be drawn from evidence in the record, the local government may choose the evidence upon which it will rely. Friends of Neabeack Hill v. City of Philomath, 30 Or LUBA 46 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Petitioners' disagreement with the county's evaluation of the evidence and its conclusions is not a basis for remand or reversal if the county's evaluation and conclusions are reasonable in light of all the evidence in the record. Sandgren v. Clackamas County, 29 Or LUBA 454 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where LUBA concludes a reasonable person could reach the decision made by a local government, in view of all the evidence cited in the record, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between conflicting evidence. Carter v. Umatilla County, 29 Or LUBA 181 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The mere existence of a survey or computer listing of a city's available industrial land, absent argument by petitioner that particular listed sites represent available, industrially designated sites in the vicinity of a proposed plan map amendment, does not refute other evidence relied on by the city to determine there are no suitable alternative sites within a reasonable area of a proposed plan map amendment. Salem Golf Club v. City of Salem, 28 Or LUBA 561 (1995).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where there is conflicting evidence concerning the effectiveness of a condition requiring golf course closures during spraying operations to avoid significant effects on or cost increases in such spraying, a finding that the condition has been effective is supported by substantial evidence. Von Lubken v. Hood River County, 28 Or LUBA 362 (1994).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the evidence in the record cited by the parties can be characterized as conflicting, but does not so undermine the local government's conclusion as to make the conclusions unreasonable, the record contains substantial evidence supporting the local government's conclusion. Mazeski v. Wasco County, 28 Or LUBA 178 (1994).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the evidentiary support for a local government's determination of compliance with a relevant code standard is a 1990 traffic study, that evidentiary support is not undermined by a 1992 traffic study in the record which is based on data collected over a shorter period of time and from fewer intersections, further from the affected area. Heine v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 571 (1994).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the evidence in the record concerning likely impacts associated with a vacation rental dwelling is largely conflicting opinion testimony, and could reasonably lead to a conclusion that relevant approval criteria either are or are not met, the choice of which evidence to believe belongs to the local government. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where LUBA concludes a reasonable person could reach the decision made by the local government, in view of all the evidence in the record, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between conflicting evidence. Bottum v. Union County, 26 Or LUBA 407 (1994).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A local government's decision that a proposed plan map amendment would negatively impact groundwater quantity and violate an applicable plan criterion is supported by substantial evidence where there is conflicting lay and expert testimony, and the expert testimony concedes the uncertainty of the proposal's impacts. Ericsson v. Washington County, 26 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Testimony from an Oregon Department of Forestry (DOF) representative which suggests a proposed dwelling could be compatible with forest uses, but was clarified by the DOF representative to eliminate any suggestion of compatibility, is not evidence a reasonable decision maker would rely upon to establish a proposed nonforest dwelling is compatible with forest uses. DLCD v. Lincoln County, 26 Or LUBA 89 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Determining compatibility is inherently subjective. Where there is conflicting believable evidence concerning a proposed PUD's compatibility with the surrounding neighborhood, LUBA will not disturb the local government's determination that the height of the proposed buildings is compatible with the surrounding neighborhood. Corbett/Terwilliger Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 601 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. LUBA will defer to a local government's choice between conflicting believable evidence. Cemper v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 486 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The choice between conflicting believable evidence belongs to the local government, and so long as the evidence relied upon by the local government is such that a reasonable person could reach the conclusion that the local government reaches, the decision is supported by substantial evidence in the whole record. McInnis v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 376 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The choice between conflicting believable evidence belongs to the local government decision maker. Neuharth v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 267 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. The choice between conflicting believable evidence belongs to the local government. Clarke v. City of Hillsboro, 25 Or LUBA 195 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A school district letter rating schools as adequate to serve a proposed subdivision is adequate to demonstrate compliance with a code requirement for documentation of school facility adequacy, notwithstanding a subsequent letter from the school district raising questions about the earlier rating, where the executive director of school district facilities expressly reaffirms the earlier rating of the schools as adequate. Miller v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Evidence in the local record that there are currently a certain number of approved mobile home subdivision lots within a local jurisdiction, is not undermined by a statement in the comprehensive plan that several years earlier, a different number of mobile home subdivision lots were approved, but had not been "finalized." Mannenbach v. City of Dallas, 25 Or LUBA 136 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where the evidence in the record cited by petitioner does not so undermine the evidence in the record relied upon by the local government that it is unreasonable for the local government to have relied on it, LUBA will defer to the local government's choice between conflicting evidence. Smith v. Lane County, 25 Or LUBA 1 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where LUBA concludes a reasonable person could reach the decision made by the local government, in view of all the evidence in the record, it defers to the local government's choices between conflicting evidence and of reasonable conclusions to be drawn from the evidence. Heceta Water District v. Lane County, 24 Or LUBA 402 (1993).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where there is conflicting believable evidence, the choice of which evidence to believe belongs to the local government. Giesy v. Benton County, 24 Or LUBA 328 (1992).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where a local decision maker relies on prior nonspecific and equivocal testimony concerning the location and presence of wetlands, in place of a well documented specific expert study, and adopts no findings explaining that choice, the challenged decision is not supported by substantial evidence. Reeder v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 583 (1992).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. A county determination that particular land is "agricultural land" is supported by substantial evidence in the record where the comprehensive plan defines agricultural land to include land consisting of predominantly Class I-IV soils as determined by SCS soil maps, and there is no dispute that the subject land consists of predominantly Class I-IV soils based on such SCS maps. Expert testimony that the subject land is not agricultural land, based on a different definition, does not undermine the county's determination. Wells v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 402 (1992).

1.6.5 Administrative Law – Substantial Evidence – Conflicting Evidence. Where conflicting evidence does not so undermine the evidence relied upon by the local decision maker that it is unreasonable for the decision maker to rely upon it, the choice between such conflicting believable evidence belongs to the local government decision maker and LUBA will not disturb that choice. Harwood v. Lane County, 23 Or LUBA 191 (1992).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. The "clearly supports" standard at ORS 197.835(11)(b) does not authorize LUBA to affirm a decision notwithstanding inadequate findings, where the lack of adequate findings concern a subjective approval standard under Goal 16 requiring that the local government, in approving development in an estuary, identify the "public need [for] and gain" from the project warrant any modification or loss to estuarine values that would result from the development, and evaluate and minimize the adverse impacts of development. Oregon Shores Conservation Coalition v. Coos County, 76 Or LUBA 346 (2017).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. ORS 197.835(11)(b) is a limited vehicle that does not allow LUBA to affirm a decision based on an alternative legal theory not considered below, if that alternative theory requires significant, discretionary legal and evidentiary determinations regarding which instrument created a disputed parcel, and whether the resulting parcel is a legal lot of record. Grimstad v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 360 (2016).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. A finding that is ambiguous regarding whether a restaurant and meeting area in a destination resort each provide 100 seats, as required by local code, is not a basis for reversal or remand, where all the evidence in the record indicates that the two facilities each provide 100 seats, and the petitioner cites no contrary evidence. Under these circumstances, LUBA will affirm that portion of the decision notwithstanding inadequate findings, because the evidence in the record "clearly supports" a finding that the 100-seat requirement is met. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 540 (2016).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where there is conflicting evidence regarding a subjective code standard requiring a finding that a destination resort expansion is "integral" to the remainder of the resort, LUBA will decline to use its authority under ORS 197.835(11)(b) to affirm a decision notwithstanding inadequate findings, based on evidence that "clearly supports" the decision. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 74 Or LUBA 540 (2016).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Although ORS 197.835(11)(b) authorizes LUBA to overlook defective findings where evidence in the record "clearly supports the decision," ORS 197.835(11)(b) does not authorize a local government's total failure to identify any supporting findings in a case that is factually and legally complex. Pinnacle Alliance Group, LLC v. City of Sisters, 73 Or LUBA 169 (2016).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Under ORS 197.835(11)(b), LUBA may overlook inadequate findings where the evidence makes a finding of compliance with the criteria obvious or inevitable. But ORS 197.835(11)(b) generally will not apply where the criteria are subjective and does not apply in a case where an applicant for approval of wind turbines relies on one kind of evidence, opponents rely heavily on a different kind of evidence, and the decision makes no attempt to identify which evidence the decision maker found persuasive or why. Burgermeister v. Tillamook County, 73 Or LUBA 291 (2016).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. ORS 197.835(11)(b) authorizes LUBA to overlook "defective" findings regarding a relevant legal standard, if a party can identify evidence that "clearly supports" a decision that the standard is met. But where the legal standard requires completion of a condition within a "reasonable time," there are no findings addressing the "reasonable time" standard, and the evidence falls far short of clearly supporting a decision that a 10-year delay in completing the condition was a "reasonable time," ORS 197.835(11)(b) does not apply. Space Age Fuel, Inc. v. Umatilla County, 72 Or LUBA 92 (2015).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. The ORS 197.835(11)(b) "clearly supports" standard is considerably more demanding than the substantial evidence standard, and is generally only appropriately applied to approval standards that are objective or do not require interpretation or much discretionary judgment. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 70 Or LUBA 368 (2014).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. The ORS 197.835(11)(b) "clearly supports" standard is not met where LUBA must weigh conflicting evidence or resolve disputes over the credibility of experts. STOP Tigard Oswego Project, LLC v. City of West Linn, 68 Or LUBA 360 (2013).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Notwithstanding that a city erroneously determined that a particular section of the development code exempted a permit applicant from development code buffer requirements, where another section of the development code cited by the petitioner clearly does exempt the permit applicant from the buffer requirements, LUBA will affirm the city's decision. ORS 197.835(11)(b). Nielsen v. City of Gresham, 66 Or LUBA 24 (2012).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Under ORS 215.283(2)(k), buildings "necessary" for the operation of a waste disposal facility are permitted. Where the findings are insufficient, but the record includes evidence which clearly establishes that proposed buildings are "necessary," and no contrary evidence in the record is cited, LUBA will affirm the conclusion that the proposed buildings are "necessary." Crocker v. Jefferson County, 60 Or LUBA 317 (2010).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. LUBA will decline to address arguments under ORS 197.835(11)(b) that the record "clearly supports" a finding that use of land for two recreational vehicle pads is "accessory" to a dwelling on an adjacent lot, where the critical unresolved issue is not evidentiary but rather interpretative. Fessler v. City of Fossil, 55 Or LUBA 1 (2007).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. LUBA will not affirm a decision under the harmless error doctrine or ORS 197.835(11)(b) notwithstanding failure to adopt findings applicable to conditional uses allowed in the zone, based on findings adopted to address similar site review standards, where it is not clear that the zoning district provides for the proposed use at all. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 52 Or LUBA 582 (2006).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where the record clearly reflects that a local government adopted a condition of approval that limited full development until completion of a direct connection from the proposed development to a nearby street because it was not convinced that other alternatives proposed by the applicant would solve the anticipated traffic congestion problem, any failure to adopt findings explaining the city's rejection of the applicant's alternatives does not provide a basis for reversal or remand. Premier Development v. City of McMinnville, 50 Or LUBA 666 (2005).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where a county concludes that conflicts with adjoining rural residential development commit a property to nonresource uses, the county's findings addressing OAR 660-004-0018(2)(b)(B) must explain why residential development of the subject property will not present the same risk of committing other adjacent resource lands to nonresource uses. Given the complex nature of that explanation, evidence of conflicts with rural residential uses do not "clearly support" a finding that residential zoning of the subject property will not commit adjacent resource lands, for purposes of ORS 197.835(11)(b). Friends of Douglas County v. Douglas County, 46 Or LUBA 757 (2004).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. The record does not "clearly support" a finding that petitioner's property is undevelopable, relieving a subdivision applicant of the obligation to provide access to petitioner's property, where the record includes conflicting expert testimony on that point, and the city's decision can be read to agree with petitioner's evidence that his property is developable petitioner's appeal is sufficient to allege prejudice to petitioner's substantial rights. Shaffer v. City of Happy Valley, 44 Or LUBA 536 (2003).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. LUBA will remand a county decision that alternatives to siting a radio transmission tower on EFU-zoned land are infeasible where the county did not adopt findings explaining why six of the identified sites are infeasible and the parties do not cite to evidence in the record that "clearly supports" the county's decision that the six sites are infeasible. Van Nalts v. Benton County, 42 Or LUBA 497 (2002).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence that a proposed cellular communications tower on EFU land is within an optimal area for telecommunication coverage is insufficient to allow LUBA to conclude, under ORS 197.835(11)(b), that the record "clearly supports" a finding of compliance with ORS 215.275, which requires that the local government consider reasonable alternatives to siting the tower on EFU-zoned land. Central Klamath County CAT v. Klamath County, 40 Or LUBA 129 (2001).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Although LUBA may overlook a city's failure to adopt findings addressing an approval criterion for signs under ORS 197.835(11)(b) where the record clearly supports the decision, where the record provides only an idea of what the signs will look like and the criterion requires a highly subjective judgment, application of ORS 197.835(11)(b) is not appropriate. Hubenthal v. City of Woodburn, 39 Or LUBA 20 (2000).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence that certain potential sites for a water reservoir inside the urban growth boundary are too small or would be technically difficult and costly to develop and that locating water treatment facilities on rural EFU-zoned land next to wells would have cost advantages and certain technical advantages is not sufficient to "clearly support" a decision that it is not feasible to locate the reservoir and treatment facilities on urban land rather than on rural EFU-zoned land. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. LUBA will not affirm a decision notwithstanding inadequate findings of compliance with approval criteria pursuant to ORS 197.835(11)(b), where the criterion at issue requires a subjective judgment regarding the consistency of the proposed use with the development character of the neighborhood, and the parties fail to identify evidence in the record demonstrating that compliance with the criterion is "obvious" or "inevitable." Terra v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 582 (1999).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence that a proposed asphalt plant will comply with DEQ requirements and that its emissions do not pose human health risks does not "clearly support" a finding of compliance with a plan provision requiring that the local government consider the proximity of proposed industrial uses "likely to pose a threat to air quality" with residential uses, particularly where it is not clear that the provision is limited to emissions regulated by DEQ and those that pose human health risks. City of Newberg v. Yamhill County, 36 Or LUBA 473 (1999).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. LUBA will not exercise its authority under ORS 197.835(11)(b) to affirm a decision notwithstanding inadequate findings, where the local government fails to adopt findings of compliance with a criterion requiring that planned unit development be designed to minimize the number and size of cuts and fills, and it is not obvious from evidence in the record that the PUD design minimizes cuts and fills. Salo v. City of Oregon City, 36 Or LUBA 415 (1999).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. A city cannot find it is feasible to comply with all approval criteria based on a site plan for only four of the total 15 lots and defer submission of a complete site plan, and the record does not clearly support a determination of compliance with the approval criteria where the complete site plan is not included in the record. Deal v. City of Hermiston, 35 Or LUBA 16 (1998).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. LUBA cannot determine whether inadequate findings are "clearly supported" by the record under ORS 197.835(11)(b) where the local provision to which the findings are directed is subject to numerous interpretations and the decision does not contain an adequate interpretation of that local provision. LUBA will not both fashion an interpretation of a local provision and then review the record for evidence clearly supporting findings of compliance with that provision, as interpreted. Doob v. City of Grants Pass, 34 Or LUBA 480 (1998).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence in the record that may support an intended future conditional use application, but does not address the approval criteria of the present decision, changing the designation and zoning of property, does not clearly support a conclusion that a decision approving the designation and zone change complies with applicable criteria. Larvik v. City of La Grande, 34 Or LUBA 467 (1998).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where local standards require that there be a "demonstrated public need" for a proposed subdivision of five-acre lots, letters from real estate agents describing the lack of listings for five-acre parcels do not "clearly support" a finding of demonstrated public need for the subdivision absent evidence relating the lack of listings to an identified need. Turrell v. Harney County, 34 Or LUBA 423 (1998).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. A city's error in not including findings addressing certain conditions of preliminary subdivision and PUD plan approval provides no basis for reversal or remand where the parties identify evidence in the record that clearly shows compliance with the conditions. Rochlin v. City of Portland, 34 Or LUBA 379 (1998).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where the evidence supporting an alternative plan amendment that was not selected also supports the alternative plan amendment that was selected in a legislative future streets plan amendment, the decision is supported by an adequate factual base. Fogarty v. City of Gresham, 34 Or LUBA 309 (1998).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. ORS 197.835(11)(b) allows LUBA to overlook minor defects in local government findings when substantiating evidence makes the local government's decision obvious or inevitable; it does not authorize LUBA to disregard the local government's actual findings or to read into those findings language that is not stated. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Under ORS 197.835(11)(b), LUBA is authorized to review the findings and conclusions made by the governing body and correct minor oversights or omissions; however, the county's unexplained and unsupported determination of compliance with applicable criteria is not a minor oversight, and LUBA will not analyze the record and substantiate the county's conclusions. Harcourt v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 400 (1997).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where there is conflicting evidence in the record regarding whether intervenor's application proposes development within a flood plain, LUBA cannot affirm the city's decision under ORS 197.835(11)(b) because the evidence does not "clearly support" a decision that the application does not propose development in the flood plain. Venable v. City of Albany, 33 Or LUBA 1 (1997).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. County findings are inadequate when they fail to interpret an applicable local regulation, and fail to identify facts upon which the county relied in reaching its conclusions. LUBA will not overlook such inadequacies in the findings when no party cites evidence in the record that compels the interpretation and conclusion made by the county. DLCD v. Clatsop County, 31 Or LUBA 90 (1996).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. While ORS 197.835(9) requires LUBA to affirm a local government decision in the absence of adequate findings if the parties identify evidence that "clearly supports" the decision, "clearly supports" will be interpreted narrowly to mean "makes obvious" or "makes inevitable." Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. ORS 197.835(9)(b) and 197.829(2) authorize LUBA to remedy minor oversights and imperfections in local government land use decisions, but do not permit or require LUBA to assume the responsibilities assigned to local governments, such as the weighing of evidence, the preparation of adequate findings and the interpretation of comprehensive plans and local land use regulations. Marcott Holdings, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 30 Or LUBA 101 (1995).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence which establishes there are markets for farm products from the subject property, but does not address whether products of the proposed farm will "contribute substantially" to those markets, agricultural processors and the local agricultural economy does not "clearly support" a determination that the proposed farm use satisfies a code standard requiring that "products from the farm unit contribute substantially to the agricultural economy, to agricultural processors and [to] farm markets." Kunze v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 130 (1994).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where there is conflicting expert testimony in the record, such evidence does not "clearly support" the challenged decision pursuant to ORS 197.835(9)(b). Wilson Park Neigh. Assoc. v. City of Portland, 27 Or LUBA 106 (1994).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where evidence in the record is conflicting, or provides a reasonable basis for different conclusions, such evidence does not "clearly support" the challenged decision under ORS 197.835(9)(b). Waugh v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 300 (1993).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where the relevant approval standards are subjective, it is less likely evidence will "clearly support" a decision that the approval standards are met under ORS 197.835(9)(b). Waugh v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 300 (1993).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where a county code provision requires that there be no other "feasible location" for a proposed use, county findings that do not explain why identified alternative sites are not "feasible locations" for the proposed use are impermissibly conclusory, and LUBA will remand the challenged decision unless "the parties identify relevant evidence in the record which clearly supports" the county's decision in this regard. Simmons v. Marion County, 25 Or LUBA 647 (1993).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where the challenged decision lacks adequate findings of compliance with a relevant approval standard, LUBA will not reverse or remand if the parties cite evidence in the record that "clearly supports" a determination of compliance with the standard. Choban v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 572 (1993).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Where the challenged decision does not include interpretations of relevant approval standards, and the provisions in question are ambiguous and capable of more than one sustainable interpretation, it is not possible for LUBA to determine, pursuant to ORS 197.830(9)(b), whether the evidence in the record "clearly supports" the challenged decision. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 312 (1993).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. The evidence cited by the parties does not "clearly support" a challenged local government decision where it is not clear what the relevant standards are or whether the proposed use is one allowed in the underlying zoning district. Ruff v. Harney County, 23 Or LUBA 521 (1992).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence that (1) people had expressed support for the proposed business, (2) there is no similar use in the particular community, and (3) some people want to utilize the services of the proposed use, does not "clearly support" a determination that there is a "public need" for the proposed use. Ruff v. Harney County, 23 Or LUBA 521 (1992).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Evidence that soils on a particular parcel are not particularly good for farming does not clearly support a determination that a proposed nonresource dwelling will not materially alter the stability of the land use pattern of the area, or be incompatible or interfere with adjacent farm or forest uses. Veach v. Wasco County, 23 Or LUBA 492 (1992).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. The "evidence * * * which clearly supports the decision" standard of ORS 197.835(9)(b) imposes a higher evidentiary standard than the "substantial evidence" standard of ORS 197.835(7)(a)(C). Friedman v. Yamhill County, 23 Or LUBA 306 (1992).

1.7 Administrative Law – Evidence Which Clearly Supports. Testimony concerning a lack of land zoned for rural residential development does not "clearly support" a decision that there is a demonstrable need or market demand for land zoned for rural residential development, where the findings do not explain or justify the nature of the need to be served by the rezoning or the area used in analyzing need and market demand, and the record includes evidence of a significant amount of vacant land in the general area of the property to be rezoned that is already zoned for rural residential development. Friedman v. Yamhill County, 23 Or LUBA 306 (1992).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Under the farm impacts test at ORS 215.296(1), the issue is not whether any law would prevent an accepted farm practice, such as aerial spraying of pesticides, on the farms adjacent to the proposed nonfarm use but whether the proposed nonfarm use would force a significant change in the accepted farm practice on those farms, and the burden is on the applicant to demonstrate that the proposed nonfarm use would not force a significant change. Schrepel v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 895 (2020).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. For purposes of designating marginal lands under former ORS 197.247 (1991), it is not enough for an applicant to provide a list of the allegedly qualifying lots or parcels; the applicant must provide foundational evidence that the lots or parcels are lawful and that lots or parcels that were in common ownership on July 1, 1983, are not overcounted. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 80 Or LUBA 205 (2019).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where a local code provision requires that a requested zone change be justified by proof that "[t]he potential impact upon the area resulting from the change has been considered," a finding that "[n]o significant evidence was presented by the Applicant regarding the impact upon the area, and certainly nothing indicating that the impact would be minimal or positive," does not impermissibly shift the burden of persuasion to the applicant because the applicant has the ultimate burden of establishing that their application complies with applicable criteria. Carroll v. City of Malin, 80 Or LUBA 298 (2019).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where an environmental review framework includes an implicit assumption that development meeting certain disturbance thresholds will result in significant detrimental impacts to identified resources, it is the applicant's burden to establish that the development will not result in significant detrimental impacts, and arguments that the local government failed to find that the development would result in significant detrimental impacts provide no basis for reversal or remand. Himmelberger v. City of Portland, 79 Or LUBA 367 (2019).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. When petitioner disputes the findings of a hearings officer, the burden of providing sufficient evidence and showing the law was improperly applied lies with the petitioner. If the petitioner does not show the hearings officer erred, the decision will be affirmed. Johnson v. City of Portland, 78 Or LUBA 158 (2018).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. When an opponent provides evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption under ORS 215.130(10)(a) regarding the existence, continuity, nature and extent of the proposed nonconforming use, the applicant has the burden of demonstrating that the use proposed for verification has existed and continued in its current nature and extent from the date the use became nonconforming, or 20 years prior to the date of application, whichever date is applicable. Morgan v. Jackson County, 78 Or LUBA 188 (2018).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. LUBA will deny a petitioner's challenges to a county board of commissioners' conclusion that a project application satisfies the county code requirement that "[s]ustained noise" generated from a building in which marijuana is grown "shall not exceed 30 dB(A)," based upon statements made in the applicant's engineers' report where petitioner argues the engineer reports failed to adequately describe the system as built, did not consider site-specific characteristics or address allegations that the odor control systems will generate noise in excess of 30 dB(A), but petitioner failed to point to any evidence in the record that calls into question the engineer's statements that the operation will not produce "sustained" noise that exceeds permissible levels. King v. Deschutes County, 77 Or LUBA 339 (2018).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A hearings officer improperly shifts the burden of proof to opponents of a mine to prove that the source of dust that is alleged to have a "significant impact" on adjacent farms emanates from a haul road that provides access to the mine, where the findings do not explain why the evidence that was submitted by the mine operator demonstrates that the source of the dust is not the haul road. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 301 (2016).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A hearings officer improperly shifts the burden of proof to opponents of a mine to show that source of dust depicted in photographs of the mining area is from mining activities. It is the applicant's burden of proof to show that either the source of the dust depicted in the photographs is not from the mining activities, or that it can minimize or has minimized the dust from those activities so that the hearings officer can conclude that the mining activities do not significantly contribute to the cumulative dust problem in the protected viewshed. Del Rio Vineyards, LLC v. Jackson County, 73 Or LUBA 301 (2016).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A county errs in discounting the testimony of farmer/opponents that a landfill operation causes significant changes or significant costs to their farm practices, for failure to quantify or specify the degree of impacts. While the county is free to give more weight to testimony that is quantified or more detailed over less quantified or detailed testimony, requiring opponents to quantify or specify the degree of impacts, while not requiring similar quantification or specification from the applicant, who has the burden of proof, effectively shifts the burden of proof to the opponents. Stop the Dump Coalition v. Yamhill County, 72 Or LUBA 341 (2015).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A land use regulation that assigns the burden of proof to the permit "applicant" does not require that "only the applicant" carry the burden of proof. Assigning the burden of proof to the applicant does not preclude other parties from presenting evidence and legal positions or preclude the decision maker from relying on such evidence. Pacificorp v. Deschutes County, 70 Or LUBA 89 (2014).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A hearings official's expressions of misgivings about the quality of evidence submitted by an applicant do not mean the hearings officer required the applicant to meet an impermissible "absolute certainty" burden of proof. Teen Challenge v. Lane County, 67 Or LUBA 300 (2013).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. It is the local government that determines—either explicitly or implicitly—whether the party with the burden of proof has carried his or her burden of proof. A local government decision must conclude that the governing criteria are satisfied—presumably because the party with the burden of proof carried his or her burden. Once that decision is made, it is subject to LUBA review to determine whether the local government's decision is supported by substantial evidence. Mingo v. Morrow County, 65 Or LUBA 122 (2012).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A local code provision that provides that where a proposal will have significant impacts on an area, the proponent of the proposal may be required to submit more detailed and reliable evidence that the proposal will comply with applicable approval criteria than would otherwise be required in order for the county to approve an application with fewer impacts is consistent with Fasano v. Washington Co. Comm., 264 Or 574, 586, 507 P2d 23 (1973), regarding the burden of proof in a quasi-judicial application for rezoning. Tidewater Contractors v. Curry County, 65 Or LUBA 424 (2012).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. An applicant bears the burden of proof to demonstrate that an application complies with applicable approval standards, and a local government is not required to approve a noncomplying development proposal, even if conditions of approval might be imposed that would render the proposal consistent with the applicable criteria. Wilson v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 314 (2011).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. It is generally the applicant's responsibility to anticipate a range of reasonable interpretations or approaches to demonstrating compliance with an approval standard, even if the approval standard is nonspecific and subjective, and to shape the evidence accordingly. Easterly v. Polk County, 59 Or LUBA 417 (2009).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where a local government finds that there is a lack of evidence that vacant buildable lands inside an urban growth boundary are available for development, the local government impermissibly avoids the burden placed on it by Goal 14 and the applicable administrative rules to demonstrate that additional land is needed inside the urban growth boundary for urban development. Hildenbrand v. City of Adair Village, 54 Or LUBA 734 (2007).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The property owner has the burden of proof to establish that it qualifies for the statutory prohibition against nonconsensual annexation provided by Oregon Laws 1987, chapter 737, section 3. Leupold & Stevens, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 51 Or LUBA 65 (2006).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A statement by a county commissioner during deliberations that opponents of the application have not presented proof to substantiate their assertion that the applicant has not complied with a mediated settlement does not demonstrate that the commissioner shifted the burden of proof from the applicant to the opponents, where the context of the statement makes it clear that the commissioner was simply discussing conflicting evidence on the issue. Ray v. Josephine County, 51 Or LUBA 443 (2006).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Expert evidence that an enhanced wetland is very unlikely to attract species that would conflict with operation of an adjoining aggregate mine is substantial evidence to support a finding that the enhanced wetlands will not "adversely impact" the mine, notwithstanding conflicting evidence on that point and the fact that the applicant's expert could not guarantee no adverse impacts. Cadwell v. Union County, 48 Or LUBA 500 (2005).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. When an opponent below initiates a revocation hearing regarding a previously issued permit, the local government may place the burden of proof on that opponent rather than the permitee. Stewart v. Coos County, 45 Or LUBA 525 (2003).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. OAR 660-023-0180(4) does not change an applicant's evidentiary burden to demonstrate that measures proposed to minimize of the impacts of mining are reasonable, practical and achievable. Eugene Sand and Gravel, Inc. v. Lane County, 44 Or LUBA 50 (2003).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where LUBA and the Court of Appeals have already decided that local ordinance provisions require that an applicant for a lot line adjustment demonstrate that the proposed use of the property after the lot line adjustment is served by adequate public facilities and is compatible with comprehensive plan policies, a city may not interpret those same provisions in such a way as to relieve an applicant of that burden. Robinson v. City of Silverton, 44 Or LUBA 308 (2003).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Provided the record demonstrates that the county recognized that the burden of proof remained with the applicant throughout the local proceedings, and that the county was obliged to review all of the evidence in the record to determine whether the applicant carried that burden, findings that may be read to shift the burden of proof to opponents do not provide a basis for reversal or remand. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 44 Or LUBA 777 (2003).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where a local variance provision imposes on the applicant the burden of establishing the nonexistence of alternatives to the variance, the local government errs in interpreting its code to impose on opponents the burden of establishing the existence, costs and consequences of alternatives. Stahl v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 518 (2003).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where LUBA cannot tell if the local government simply weighed conflicting evidence, or instead impermissibly rejected the opponent's evidence for failure to satisfy a nonexistent burden of proof, the local government's error in explicitly shifting the burden of proof to the opponents is not harmless. Stahl v. Tillamook County, 43 Or LUBA 518 (2003).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Isolated statements in a land use decision are not sufficient to demonstrate that the decision maker improperly shifted the burden of proof where, viewed in context, it is clear that the burden of proof was placed on the appropriate party. Dimone v. City of Hillsboro, 41 Or LUBA 167 (2001).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The rebuttable presumption provided by ORS 215.130(10)(a) does not shift the applicant's ultimate burden of proof to demonstrate compliance with all applicable approval criteria. Where a party produces sufficient evidence of the continued existence of a nonconforming use for the prior 10-year period, the statute then shifts the burden of going forward with countering evidence to the county or any party opposing the nonconforming use. When sufficient evidence is produced showing that the nonconforming use was interrupted during some period, the applicant may no longer rely on the presumption with regard to that period of interruption. Lawrence v. Clackamas County, 36 Or LUBA 273 (1999).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. An interpretation of a zoning ordinance that shifts the burden of demonstrating compliance with minimum lot size approval standards to opponents of the application is erroneous. Wood v. Crook County, 36 Or LUBA 143 (1999).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where the applicant bears the burden of demonstrating under a local provision that there is no reason to believe a potential hazard exists on the subject property, the absence of evidence regarding potential hazards on the property does not constitute substantial evidence of compliance with that provision. Jebousek v. City of Newport, 36 Or LUBA 124 (1999).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A permit applicant with the burden of demonstrating compliance with an off-site odor standard may not rely on the lack of odor-based complaints in an earlier code enforcement proceeding to establish compliance with the odor standard, where the record includes testimony about possible off-site odor problems. River City Disposal v. City of Portland, 35 Or LUBA 360 (1998).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The applicant retains the burden of proof throughout the local process to demonstrate compliance with all applicable approval criteria. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 35 Or LUBA 333 (1998).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A finding that petitioner did not present evidence showing that an approval criterion was not met does not demonstrate an improper shifting of the burden of proof from the applicant to the petitioner, where the decision maker's findings addressing the criterion also explain why the evidence that was submitted demonstrates that the approval criterion is satisfied. Hannah v. City of Eugene, 35 Or LUBA 1 (1998) (1998).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A decision maker may review certain types of land use permit applications more stringently than others, provided the higher burden of proof is not attributable to bias or some other legally impermissible reason. Lee v. City of Oregon City, 34 Or LUBA 691 (1998).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Under ORS 215.296(1), the applicant bears the burden to demonstrate that the proposed use will force no significant change in accepted farming practices or their cost, and the local government's findings must affirmatively explain why it believes there are no such significant adverse impacts. Just v. Linn County, 32 Or LUBA 325 (1997).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Under ORS 215.296(1), the county may not assume from an absence of information in the record that there are no adverse farm impacts. The burden is on the county to identify and explain why it believes there are no significant adverse impacts and why it believes the cost of accepted farm practices would not be increased. Brown v. Union County, 32 Or LUBA 168 (1996).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The proponent of a nonconforming use carries the burden to demonstrate the use was lawfully established and continued without interruption. Fraley v. Deschutes County, 31 Or LUBA 566 (1996).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. While it is the applicants' burden to demonstrate compliance with relevant approval criteria, if a local government determines an approval criterion is not satisfied, it must adopt findings explaining why it believes the applicants failed to meet this burden. Neuman v. Benton County, 29 Or LUBA 172 (1995).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A local governing body in considering an appeal of a planning commission decision approving a subdivision may not shift the burden of proof from the applicant to the opponents of the subdivision. Andrews v. City of Prineville, 28 Or LUBA 653 (1995).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The protected right to continue a nonconforming use is a right to continue the nature and extent of use that existed at the time the use became nonconforming. The proponents of a nonconforming use have the burden of producing evidence from which a local government can make an adequate determination of the nature and extent of the nonconforming use. Tylka v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 417 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The burden of showing an alleged nonconforming use was lawfully established at the time it became nonconforming rests with the proponent. Spurgin v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 383 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where the local code requires that a proposed use will not force a significant change in, or significantly increase the cost of, accepted farm or forest practices on surrounding land, the applicant has the burden of identifying the relevant accepted farm and forest practices and producing evidence showing those practices will not be significantly changed or their costs significantly increased. Lyon v. Linn County, 28 Or LUBA 402 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. During the local proceedings, the applicant for development approval bears the burden of proof to establish its application satisfies relevant approval standards. Where the local government shifted that burden to opponents of the development application, the challenged decision must be remanded. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 274 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where the local code explicitly provides that a tie vote of the decision making body means the appealed decision of a lower level decision maker stands, the general rule that a tie vote of a decision maker amounts to a failure of the applicant to carry the burden of proof does not apply. Derry v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 212 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A finding stating there is no evidence in the record that a proposed conditional use will cause pollution, which simply describes the contents of the record, does not indicate the local government improperly shifted the burden of proof from the applicant to opponents. Tucker v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 134 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Even after an initial local government decision is made approving a permit application, and a local appeal is filed, the applicant has the burden of establishing that the proposal satisfies relevant approval standards. McKenzie v. Multnomah County, 27 Or LUBA 523 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A Public Works Department memorandum showing traffic counts, setting out accident history and making a conditional recommendation that a traffic study may be deferred is not sufficient to show the applicant carried its burden as a matter of law with regard to compliance with a code minimal adverse impact standard. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 27 Or LUBA 453 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. LUBA will not conclude a local government improperly shifted the burden of proof to those opposing a permit application, based on isolated statements in the challenged decision, where placing those isolated statements in context shows the burden of proof was not improperly shifted to opponents. Zippel v. Josephine County, 27 Or LUBA 11 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Applicants for approval to divide a 110-acre EFU-zoned parcel into 50- and 60-acre farm parcels fail to carry their burden of proof regarding a code standard requiring that the newly created parcels be of sufficient size to continue existing commercial agricultural enterprises in the area, where the applicants submit evidence concerning agricultural activity only on the property proposed to be divided. Van Veldhuizen v. Marion County, 26 Or LUBA 468 (1994).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. More than the mere possibility of compliance with applicable standards is required to grant land use approval. However, it does not follow that the possibility that the additional development allowable under a requested comprehensive plan map amendment will violate an applicable standard is insufficient to provide a basis for denial of the request. It is the applicant's burden to establish compliance with all approval standards. Ericsson v. Washington County, 26 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Because an applicant for development approval bears the burden of proof in a local government proceeding, if the challenged local government's decision denies petitioner's request for zoning clearance, only one sustainable basis for the decision is required. McPeek v. Coos County, 26 Or LUBA 165 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where the challenged local government decision determines the applicant had no burden of proof in the local proceedings, the decision demonstrates the decision maker improperly shifted the burden of proof to the local appellants. Derry v. Douglas County, 26 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Although a local appellant may have the burden under local code provisions of demonstrating error in a lower local decision maker's decision, the applicant for permit approval retains the burden of proof concerning compliance with all applicable approval criteria throughout the local appeals process. Mohler v. Josephine County, 26 Or LUBA 1 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. To establish actual bias or prejudgment on the part of a local decision maker, the petitioner has the burden of showing the decision maker was biased or prejudged the application and did not reach a decision by applying relevant standards based on the evidence and argument presented. Spiering v. Yamhill County, 25 Or LUBA 695 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. It is the applicant's burden to establish compliance with each relevant approval standard. Consequently, where the applicant fails to establish compliance with a single approval standard, a decision denying an application will be affirmed. Adler v. City of Portland, 25 Or LUBA 546 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. A local government finding that "there was no reliable evidence of" noncompliance with approval standards, read in context, is an evaluation of the state of the evidentiary record, and not an indication that the local government improperly shifted the burden of proof from the applicant for land use approval to opponents. Murphy Citizens Advisory Comm. v. Josephine County, 25 Or LUBA 312 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Although a local government is not required to discuss in its findings the evidence it does not rely on to support its decision, doing so may improve its chances of success on appeal to LUBA. LUBA will not read such findings as improperly shifting the burden of proof, where the findings read as a whole show the local government was only trying to demonstrate that it considered all relevant evidence. McKay Creek Valley Assoc. v. Washington County, 25 Or LUBA 238 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Where applicants wish to establish the scope of a nonconforming use, they have the burden of producing evidence from which the local decision maker can determine the scope of the nonconforming use. If applicants present nonspecific information, they run the risk that reasonable people, including the local decision maker, will disagree with them concerning the scope of the nonconforming use. Warner v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 82 (1993).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. An allegation that the county planning commission referred to petitioner during the local appeal proceedings as the "applicant," rather than the appellant, does not establish that the local government impermissibly shifted the burden of proof from the applicant to petitioner. Columbia River Television v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 82 (1992).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Findings which indicate the local1 government believed the applicants submitted sufficient evidence to support a conclusion that the relevant approval standards were met, and that petitioners did not present evidence adequate to undermine that conclusion, reflect a correct understanding of the applicants' burden of proof. Bouman v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 628 (1992).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. Petitioner does not have a burden to establish that the proposed UGB amendment will conflict with the adjoining inventoried Goal 5 resource, rather it is the applicant's burden to establish no conflicts will result from the proposed UGB amendment. ODOT v. City of Newport, 23 Or LUBA 408 (1992).

1.8 Administrative Law – Burden of Proof. The applicant for comprehensive plan and zone map amendments has the burden of establishing compliance of the proposed amendments with the applicable approval standards. Hess v. City of Portland, 23 Or LUBA 343 (1992).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. ORS 197.835(2)(b) and OAR 661-01-0045(1) authorize LUBA to consider evidence outside the record where the proponent demonstrates that there are disputed allegations in the parties' briefs regarding the "unconstitutionality of the decision." However, where petitioners do not intend to argue that a city's decision is unconstitutional, but rather that the city erred in failing to comply with its city charter requirement for a vote, based on the city's reliance on a statute that petitioners believe unconstitutionally infringes on the city's charter authority, LUBA will deny petitioners' motion to take evidence because evidence on the constitutionality of a statute is not one of the bases for taking evidence outside the record under ORS 197.835(2)(b) and OAR 661-010-0045(1). Renken v. City of Oregon City, 78 Or LUBA 1070 (2018).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. In a motion to take evidence outside the record pursuant to OAR 661-010-0045(1), and (2)(a) and (c), petitioners' argument—that two city employees violated petitioners' rights under the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution because the employees engaged in the "unequal" application of the applicable standards in processing two similarly situated planned unit development (PUD) projects—fails to demonstrate that the proffered evidence would concern "procedural irregularities not shown in the record and which, if proved, would warrant reversal or remand of the decision" because petitioners do not allege that the final decision maker violated petitioners' constitutional rights. Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. To succeed in a motion to take evidence outside the record and pursuant to OAR 661-010-0045(1), and (2)(a) and (c), regarding an alleged violation of petitioners' rights under the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, the movant must develop a legal theory and a set of factual assertions sufficient to allow LUBA to determine how consideration of the proffered evidence would "affect the outcome of the review proceeding." Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. It would be inconsistent with sound principles of judicial review, ORS 197.805, for LUBA to resolve a constitutional challenge to the procedure a city uses to approve an annexation, in a direct appeal of the city decision approving the annexation, when the same issue is pending before a circuit court in a writ of mandamus proceeding between the same parties, seeking to compel the city to approve the annexation under a different procedure. J4J Misc PAC v. City of Jefferson, 75 Or LUBA 120 (2017).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. A petitioner's constitutional challenge to a city's denial of a business license fee exemption, in its appeal of a land use permit decision, is premature for two reasons. First, the challenged decision only requires business licenses, without specifying whether exemptions to the business license fee might apply. Second, because the city took the position at LUBA that it intended to deny the business license exemption, and the decision failed to include finding on that issue, the decision must be remanded for response findings. Bend/Sisters Garden RV Resort, LLC v. City of Sisters, 72 Or LUBA 200 (2015).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Fasano v. Washington County, 264 Or 574, 507 P2d 23 (1973), does not give a party an independent constitutional right to notice of a hearing in addition to a statutory or local code right to notice of a hearing. Plaid Pantries, Inc. v. City of Tigard, 60 Or LUBA 441 (2010).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Code procedures that distinguish between "Type II" permit decisions that can be made without an initial hearing, with an opportunity for affected persons to appeal to a de novo hearing, and "Type III" permit decisions that require an initial hearing, do not violate the privileges and immunities clause by granting "privileges" to participants of Type III proceedings that are denied Type II participants. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 56 Or LUBA 240 (2008).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. A challenge to a city decision denying building permits under the city's sign ordinance is necessarily viewed as an "as-applied" challenge rather than a facial challenge, because the challenged decision is not the enactment of an ordinance by lawmakers, but rather the enforcement of the ordinance by executive officials. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Even in the context of an "as-applied" constitutional challenge, LUBA's scope of review is not limited to the code provisions directly applied to the petitioner. Depending on the type of constitutional challenge, petitioner may cite to portions of legislation not directly applied to petitioner and argue that the government's action is unconstitutional, because the legislative scheme under which the government acted includes impermissible distinctions. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Incremental impacts on a transportation facility attributable to a proposed development may support an exaction. McClure v. City of Springfield, 39 Or LUBA 329 (2001).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. LUBA will uphold an exaction requiring the dedication of right-of-way where the city's findings demonstrate that the exaction is roughly proportional to the impacts caused by the development, including any benefits the development receives by virtue of the exaction. McClure v. City of Springfield, 39 Or LUBA 329 (2001).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where a city fails to establish a relationship between vehicular and nonvehicular impacts of a proposed development and a required dedication for sidewalks, the exaction is not supportable under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). McClure v. City of Springfield, 39 Or LUBA 329 (2001).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. A waiver of remonstrance to the formation of a local improvement district is not subject to the analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), because it, by itself, does not result in the loss of property. McClure v. City of Springfield, 39 Or LUBA 329 (2001).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. A city does not violate an applicant's right to due process by denying its request to cross-examine witnesses, where the local code provides no right of cross-examination and the applicant fails to explain why an alternative process offered by the city in place of cross-examination would be insufficient to protect the applicant's right to due process. Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where a city allows one party more time to present oral testimony during a land use hearing than is allowed another party, the unequal allocation of time will not constitute error so long as the city's decision explains the reason for the differentiation, there is an unlimited opportunity to submit written testimony, and the unequal allocation of time does not cause substantial prejudice. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 183 (2000).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. An enumeration of alleged procedural irregularities, without analysis, does not amount to a reviewable claim of a constitutional violation. Fechtig v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 410 (1996).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where petitioner makes no distinction in his brief between state and federal constitutional issues, LUBA cannot consider his constitutional arguments. Fence v. Jackson County, 30 Or LUBA 265 (1995).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. Under Article IV, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution, a legislative act is limited to one subject, and that subject must be expressed in the act's title. O'Mara v. Douglas County, 25 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. There is nothing unconstitutional about providing only published notice of legislative rezoning. Sabin v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 23 (1990).

2.1.1 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Procedural Issues. It is reasonable for a county to adopt special procedures for application of new criteria to amended permit applications already reviewed by a county decision maker, in order to avoid undue delay in processing the amended applications while providing notice and a de novo hearing on the new criteria. Because such procedures have a rational basis, they do not violate Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution (Equal Privileges and Immunities). Eckis v. Linn County, 19 Or LUBA 15 (1990).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioner fails to establish a basis for reversal or remand under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution where there is no evidence that other city-approved applications for a zone change to residential are factually identical to his application. Carroll v. City of Malin, 80 Or LUBA 298 (2019).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city council decision approving a subdivision that was not an amendment of the city's development code, was not adopted by ordinance, and was the result of a quasi-judicial, rather than legislative process, does not violate the prohibition in Article I, section 21, of the Oregon Constitution against laws that delegate the power to amend those laws to another entity. Harra v. City of West Linn, 77 Or LUBA 136 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Brown v. City of Medford, 251 Or App 42, 47, 283 P3d 367 (2012), sets forth the two-part test that is applied to determine the constitutionality of an "exaction" under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. First, under Nollan v. California Coastal Comm'n, 483 US 825, 831-32, 107 S Ct 3141, 97 L Ed 677 (1987), the exaction must "substantially advance the same government interest that would furnish a valid ground for denial of the development permit." Second, under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), "the nature and extent of the exaction must be 'roughly proportional' to the effect of the proposed development." Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To determine whether a local government's conditions of approval satisfy the Nollan v. California Coastal Comm'n, 483 US 825, 831-32, 107 S Ct 3141, 97 L Ed 677 (1987), "essential nexus" prong of the two-part test for assessing the constitutionality of a government exaction, the local government must show "(1) what interests would allow the [local government] to deny [the applicant's proposed land] partition, and (2) how the exaction would serve those interests." Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a city has two separate criteria—a transportation impacts criterion, and a services and utilities criterion—both of which are generally concerned with achieving and maintaining an adequate and safe transportation system, and both criteria must be satisfied, a finding that one of those criteria is satisfied does not necessarily mean the other criterion is satisfied. In such a situation, simply because the city found no "traffic impacts" requiring mitigation under the traffic impacts criterion does not mean the city imposed an unconstitutional exaction when it required right-of-way dedication and street improvements as conditions of approval to satisfy the services and utilities criterion. It simply means the city applies the rights-of-way requirements through the services and utilities criterion, rather than the transportation impacts criterion. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To determine whether "the nature and extent of the exaction is 'roughly proportional' to the effect of the proposed development" under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 391, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), "[n]o precise mathematical calculation is required, but the city must make some sort of individualized determination that the required dedication is related both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development." Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. As part of the "rough[] proportional[ity]" test under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), a hearings officer commits no error when he or she identifies and relies upon potential "sub-impacts" of a proposed development, including street infrastructure wear and tear, pollution and safety, which may not be readily quantifiable, in conjunction with a quantifiable motor vehicle trip generation analysis to determine whether the impacts of the proposed development are "roughly proportional" to the required right-of-way dedication. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. As part of the "rough[] proportional[ity]" test under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), although a local government's decision to compare the percentage of total trips in the area that can be attributed to the development proposal and the exaction's percentage of the total area of the subject property can be accused of comparing apples and oranges, that argument does not provide a basis for remand or reversal, because that criticism is possible in most cases where a Dolan "rough[] proportional[ity] analysis is required. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A waiver of remonstrance to the formation of a local improvement district (LID) is not subject to the constitutional exaction analysis because it, by itself, does not result in a loss of petitioner's property. Conditions of approval, such as a waiver of remonstrance, may be applied by a local government to ensure that a development proposal conforms to the applicable approval criteria or to ensure the enforcement of other local government regulations. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A code provision that requires the applicant for a wind energy facility to obtain the signature of residential landowners consenting to reducing a two-mile setback between the facility and residences violates the Delegation Clause, Article I, section 21, of the Oregon Constitution, because the signature requirement effectively allows neighbors to "veto" the application, for any or no reason, and without appeal or review. Iberdrola Renewables v. Umatilla County, 67 Or LUBA 149 (2013).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. State constitutional provisions may be more protective than similarly worded federal constitutional provisions, and therefore that federal courts have interpreted the analogous federal constitutional provision more narrowly than state courts have interpreted the state constitutional provision has no bearing on the meaning of the state constitutional provision. Iberdrola Renewables v. Umatilla County, 67 Or LUBA 149 (2013).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a state constitutional provision resolves the controversy and provides the petitioner with a complete remedy, LUBA should decline to reach issues under an analogous federal constitutional provision. Iberdrola Renewables v. Umatilla County, 67 Or LUBA 149 (2013).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county ordinance that allows a private residential landowner or a city council to unilaterally "waive" a two-mile setback from wind towers to a lesser distance, potentially to a zero setback, violates the Article I, section 21, delegation clause of the Oregon Constitution, because it authorizes an entity other than the county to determine whether there is a setback at all and if so the extent of that setback. Cosner v. Umatilla County, 65 Or LUBA 9 (2012).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In determining whether and how to sever a sign regulation that includes an unconstitutional content-based exemption, it is the court's understanding of legislative intent that guides that severance decision. Legislative intent may or may not have anything to do with the impact that severance might have or how many signs would be affected by competing severance options. Onsite Advertising Services LLC v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 414 (2011).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A court may consider post-enactment actions by the enacting body to try to determine how that enacting body would go about severing an unconstitutional sign regulation. Onsite Advertising Services LLC v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 414 (2011).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a board of county commissioners adopted an ordinance repealing a content-based exemption to its sign regulations, rather than repealing the sign regulation altogether, a hearings officer considering local appeals of sign permit decisions governed by the old, unconstitutional version of the sign regulations properly considered the ordinance that amended the sign regulations in determining how to go about severing the unconstitutional sign regulations and applying them to the permit applications. Onsite Advertising Services LLC v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 414 (2011).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where free-standing signs are expressly prohibited by the applicable underlying zoning district, an unconstitutional content-based exemption in the sign regulations that would otherwise apply to allow free-standing signs in that zoning district provides no basis for allowing free-standing signs in that zoning district. Onsite Advertising Services LLC v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 414 (2011).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where sign regulations partially exempt regulated signs from underlying zoning requirements, including setback requirements, but the sign regulations are unconstitutional in their entirety due to a separate content-based exemption in the sign regulations, proposed signs must be denied if they violate setback requirements in the underlying zone because the exemption from those setback requirements is ineffective if the sign regulations are unconstitutional in their entirety. Onsite Advertising Services LLC v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 414 (2011).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Without a protected property interest to continued use of a particular access to an arterial, a property owner has no takings claim under the Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution or the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution when the Oregon Department of Transportation adopts a plan to close that access and require the property owner to use an alternative route to access to that arterial. Parker Johnstone Wilsonville Honda v. ODOT, 62 Or LUBA 116 (2010).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the Goal 4 rule incorporates a definition in the Oregon Structural Specialty Code, the version of the Code in effect when the Goal 4 rule was adopted controls, not the Code as subsequently amended, to avoid running afoul of constitutional prohibitions on delegating legislative authority. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Jefferson County, 62 Or LUBA 443 (2011).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To advance a facial challenge under the Takings Clause of the Oregon Constitution to an ordinance that allegedly requires an uncompensated physical invasion of private property and acquisition of a property easement, a petitioner need not demonstrate that the mere enactment of the ordinance effects a physical invasion or acquisition of property. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An ordinance requiring that developers of residential property near an airport grant the airport an uncompensated "avigation easement" that allows the airport to subject the property to noise, vibrations, fumes, dust and fuel particle emissions is facially inconsistent with the federal and state Takings Clauses, because the easement does not advance the governmental interest in reducing land use conflicts between the airport and surrounding residential uses. Under the easement, the conflicts will exist to the same degree; the only arguable effect is to make it more difficult for the property owner to advance a successful inverse condemnation or other legal action against the airport. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will not consider a petitioner's assignment of error that the county's more favorable treatment of other applicants for partition approval violates his right to equal privileges and immunities under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution, where LUBA is sustaining another assignment of error that does not raise a constitutional issue and would require remand for approval without the disputed conditions of approval in any event. Sperber v. Coos County, 60 Or LUBA 44 (2009).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The single-subject requirement of Article IV, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution limits every legislative act to one subject and renders the act void with respect to any subject embraced in the legislation that is not expressed in the title. ORS 197.522, which was adopted as part of an act the subject of which is "moratorium on land development," runs afoul of the single-subject requirement to the extent it is interpreted to apply to development permits outside the context of a declared or de facto moratorium. Reeder v. Multnomah County, 59 Or LUBA 240 (2009).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That ORS 197.522 was not intended to apply to development permits outside the context of a declared or de facto moratorium is supported by the legislative history of the bill that enacted it, which indicates that the legislative discussion was focused exclusively on amending the moratoria statutes and included no suggestion that the legislature contemplated that the section codified at ORS 197.522 should be applied outside the context of a moratorium. Reeder v. Multnomah County, 59 Or LUBA 240 (2009).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The arbitrary application of facially neutral laws could constitute a violation of Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution, but showing that a local government has treated different applications differently falls far short of demonstrating such a violation, particularly when there are factual differences in the applications that could easily explain the different treatment. Sperber v. Coos County, 58 Or LUBA 570 (2009).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a local ordinance that restricts the size of all electronic signs except those operated by government agencies as public signs is not concerned with the content of the messages being displayed on the electronic signs, under Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution, the ordinance is a content neutral restriction on speech that is a reasonable time, place and manner restriction. Lamar Advertising Company v. City of Eugene, 54 Or LUBA 295 (2007).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In the absence of evidence in the record indicating that a local government is allowing certain private parties to use government signs to display private commercial messages and that use results in discrimination against particular speakers, no violation of Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution has occurred. Lamar Advertising Company v. City of Eugene, 54 Or LUBA 295 (2007).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a local government's only claimed basis for imposing an exaction that requires off-site road improvements is that a subdivision would otherwise violate a code standard regarding street system impacts, and LUBA finds that the local government has not established that the subdivision would violate the code standard, there is also no basis to impose the exaction. PacWest II, Inc. v. City of Madras, 53 Or LUBA 241 (2007).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where statutes grant a triple majority of property owners in an area to be annexed the unilateral right to consent to the proposed annexation, and thereby make an election in the area to be annexed unnecessary, but do not grant a similar unilateral right to resident electors who do not own property, the resident electors constitute a true class for purposes of considering whether those statutes violate Article I, section 20. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. For purposes of an Article I, section 20, challenge to statutes that grant privileges to some classes and not to others, suspect classifications are not necessarily limited to classifications based on immutable characteristics, but the class of voters who do not own property is not a suspect classification. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because the triple majority method of annexation does not discriminate based on a suspect classification, it need only bear a rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose. The classification involved in the triple majority method of annexation is rationally related to a legitimate state purpose. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. There is no right under either the federal or Oregon constitution to vote on questions of incorporation or annexation. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a right to vote in a general election is extended by statute, any classification restricting that franchise on grounds other than residence, age, and citizenship must be shown to serve a compelling state interest. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In analyzing annexation statutes, if those statutes are viewed as restricting a statutory right to vote, strict scrutiny is generally applied under the Equal Protection Clause; but if those statutes are viewed as merely presenting alternative annexation methods, where some provide for elections and some do not, rational basis scrutiny is generally applied under the Equal Protection Clause. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The more clearly and cleanly statutes that authorize different annexation methods segregate the annexation methods that do not require elections from those that do, the more likely the statutes will not be subject to strict scrutiny as statutes that restrict voting rights. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. When statutes do not make it clear at the time an annexation is initiated whether the annexation will ultimately be subject to an election before the annexation can take effect, or the statutes appear to grant a right to vote on an annexation but also allow the election to be foreclosed at some later point in the annexation process, those statutes are likely to be subject to strict scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause as statutes that restrict voting rights. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The right to an election that ORS 222.111(5) grants is not an absolute right. There is no right to vote in health hazard, double majority, island or triple majority annexations. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unlike annexation statutes that have been subject to strict scrutiny and found to violate the Equal Protection Clause as an improper restriction on voting rights, the triple majority method of annexation authorized by ORS 222.170(1) does not have the have the legal effect of "nullifying a vote," "preventing an election" or "halting an election." ORS 222.170(1) simply makes an election unnecessary; it does not foreclose an election or prohibit the city from submitting the proposed annexation to the voters in the territory to be annexed, notwithstanding that a triple majority of the property owners in the territory to be annexed consent to the annexation. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. ORS 222.750, which allows a city to annex an "island" of territory without consent or a vote of the residents or landowners within the island, does not distinguish between classes of persons based on a "suspect" classification, for purposes of Article I, section 20 (Privileges and Immunities), of the Oregon Constitution. Therefore, the statute must be upheld if the differential treatment between persons residing or owning property within such islands and those residing or owning property in other types of unincorporated territory has a "rational basis," i.e., bears some relationship to a legitimate end. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 49 Or LUBA 512 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Reducing jurisdictional confusion and administrative and service inefficiencies created by "islands" of unincorporated territory surrounded by a city are legitimate legislative ends. A statute that makes it easier to incorporate such islands by eliminating the requirement to obtain the consent or electoral majority of residents or landowners within such islands furthers those legislative ends, and therefore the statute survives rational basis scrutiny under Article I, section 20 (Privileges and Immunities), of the Oregon Constitution. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 49 Or LUBA 512 (2005).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The initiative powers reserved to the people under Oregon Constitution Article IV, section 1(5), are limited to "legislative" matters, and do not include "administrative" matters. An initiative that is directed at or has the effect of overturning a previous administrative or adjudicative decision is itself administrative in nature and thus beyond the electorate's Article IV, section 1(5), powers. Port of Hood River v. City of Hood River, 47 Or LUBA 62 (2004).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An initiative that effectively rezones a single property in unified ownership involves an "administrative" matter rather than "municipal legislation" and is therefore beyond the electorate's Article IV, section 1(5), powers. Port of Hood River v. City of Hood River, 47 Or LUBA 62 (2004).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A broad and poorly defined sign code prohibition on "billboards" does not necessarily require inquiry into the content of signs or allow content-based distinctions where, as interpreted by the city, the code allows or prohibits all signs, including "billboards," based on specific standards that do not require inquiry into the content of proposed signs. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A poorly defined code prohibition on "billboards" is not unconstitutionally overbroad when, read in context, it is subject to a narrowing construction that clarifies the meaning of "billboard" and the precise scope of the prohibition. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An argument that a sign code definition of "image" impermissibly distinguishes between content because it regulates representational images but not abstract images does not provide a basis for reversal or remand, where nothing in the sign code narrows the scope of the term "image" to exclude abstract or non-representational images. Cotter v. City of Portland, 46 Or LUBA 612 (2004).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In the absence of a content-neutral way of distinguishing wall murals from other types of signs, a city's regulatory choice lies between deregulating signs altogether or regulating murals along with signs. A city's choice to regulate murals along with signs does not violate Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution, where graphic expression by muralists is burdened only to the same extent as other types of constitutionally protected expression. Cotter v. City of Portland, 46 Or LUBA 612 (2004).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city's failure to address subjective language in a sign code criterion does not provide a basis for reversal or remand, where the petitioner also argues that applying that code language to approve or deny a sign application would be inconsistent with Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution. Cotter v. City of Portland, 46 Or LUBA 612 (2004).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That the record does not contain evidence of the specific content of proposed billboards does not indicate that a city's denial of the billboards was not content-based, where the city's sign ordinance defines permitted signs by content, the city denied the proposed signs because they were not among the types of signs allowed by the ordinance, and the city's denial reflects a belief or assumption about the types of speech the proposed billboards would not include. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A sign ordinance that defines and regulates six permitted types of signs, and implicitly prohibits all others, necessarily requires inquiry into the content of the proposed sign in order to determine which if any of the six permitted categories and six different sets of standards apply. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While distinction between "off-premises" and "on-premises" signs is not necessarily a content-based distinction in violation of Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution, a sign ordinance that allows some types of off-premises speech and prohibits others necessarily distinguishes between speech based on content, and is therefore inconsistent with Article I, section 8. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A sign ordinance that impermissibly allows certain types of speech while prohibiting other types of speech based on content in violation of Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution may also, for the same reason, violate the equal privileges and immunities clause under Article I, section 20. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 44 Or LUBA 503 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An evidentiary proceeding before LUBA is not warranted to consider evidence that the petitioner has installed "light emitting diodes" on an existing sign in order to engage in constitutionally protected speech, where the question of whether petitioner's installation is constitutionally protected speech is a legal conclusion, not an assertion of fact. Meredith v. Lincoln County, 44 Or LUBA 821 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A petitioner's claim that a variance applicant received favorable treatment by the city provides no basis for concluding that the local government thereby improperly extended a "privilege or immunity" to the applicant under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution, where petitioner does not allege that she or any other variance applicant were denied similarly favorable treatment. Lord v. City of Oregon City, 43 Or LUBA 361 (2002).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The fact that a city approved billboards 20 years ago under a very different regulatory scheme than the current one has little bearing on whether the city violated petitioner's state and federal constitutional rights in denying its application for a billboard under current regulations. Absent a showing of similarity between the old and new regulatory schemes, evidence of prior approvals does not demonstrate that a city acted arbitrarily or extended privileges to others that were denied to petitioners, and consideration of extra-record evidence under OAR 661-010-0045 is not warranted. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 43 Or LUBA 659 (2003).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city decision concluding that applying local sign ordinance criteria to deny a sign permit would violate Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution is inadequate, where the findings do not identify what aspects of the local sign ordinance the city believes would be found to be unconstitutional or explain why the city believes it would be unconstitutional to apply the sign ordinance. Haug v. City of Newberg, 42 Or LUBA 411 (2002).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where an application for city approval of a sign that is larger than allowed by city sign standards does not meet the city's criteria for approval of such larger signs, a city may not cite constitutional concerns and approve the request for a larger sign without (1) adopting a reviewable decision that explains what constitutional provisions the city believes would be violated and why, and (2) explaining why the appropriate remedy in that circumstance would not be to deny the request until constitutional provisions for allowing such larger signs are adopted. Haug v. City of Newberg, 42 Or LUBA 411 (2002).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Although the basic thrust of Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution is the same as the federal Takings Clause, the two provisions are not necessarily identical. Absent particular arguments based on Article I, section 18, LUBA will not consider claims under the state constitution that are based solely on federal takings jurisprudence. Carver v. City of Salem, 42 Or LUBA 305 (2002).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Eliminating a quasi-judicial UGB amendment process for housing, while providing such a process for nonhousing needs, does not violate petitioner's rights under either the Equal Protection Clause of the US Constitution or the Privileges and Immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, where petitioner's housing developer members are not a suspect class, and the local government's distinction between housing and nonhousing UGB amendments is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Homebuilders Assoc. v. Metro, 42 Or LUBA 176 (2002).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Comments by one local government decision maker expressing frustration at the perceived burdens created by a statute promoted by petitioner is insufficient to establish that the local government, in adopting a legislative amendment to the local government's plan and code that is adverse to petitioner's interests, impermissibly retaliated against petitioner for exercising its free speech and other constitutional rights. Homebuilders Assoc. v. Metro, 42 Or LUBA 176 (2002).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Determining whether a statute violates the Contracts Clause, Article I, section 21, of the Oregon Constitution, requires two steps: (1) determining whether a contract exists to which the party asserting impairment is a party; and (2) determining whether the statute impairs the obligations under that contract. In making the required determinations under the Contracts Clause, LUBA applies standard principles of contract law. City of Sherwood v. Washington County, 38 Or LUBA 656 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a letter from city planning director and county memorandum setting out circumstances surrounding a compromise is not sufficient to establish an agreement between the parties establishing rights and obligations, the Contracts Clause, Article I, section 21, of the Oregon Constitution, is not applicable. City of Sherwood v. Washington County, 38 Or LUBA 656 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The remedies clause, Article I, section 10, of the Oregon Constitution, allows the state to alter or abolish a cause of action, so long as an injured party is not left entirely without a remedy. The remedy need not be of precisely the same type, as long as the remedy is a substantial one. Hale v. Port of Portland, 308 Or 508, 523, 783 P2d 506 (1989). City of Sherwood v. Washington County, 38 Or LUBA 656 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even if immunity provisions of ORS 467.131 and 467.133 violate the remedies clause, Article I, section 10, of the Oregon Constitution, that infirmity does not implicate the limited preemption provisions of ORS 467.136 or the total preemption provisions of ORS 166.170 through 166.176. City of Sherwood v. Washington County, 38 Or LUBA 656 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A land use regulation that makes no reference to protected speech is analyzed under the third of the categories set out in State v. Robertson, 293 Or 402, 649 P2d 569 (1982), to determine whether, as applied, the regulation impermissibly burdens the applicant's right of free speech under Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution. Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. If the real reason a city council denied an adult video store owner's request for a conditional permit for extended operating hours was the city council's opposition to the nature of the business, rather than its finding that the request did not satisfy relevant approval criteria, it would necessarily follow that the city's decision violates Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution. Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city's denial of an existing adult video store's application for a conditional use permit for extended operating hours to allow 24-hour operation does not violate Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution, where (1) the conditional use approval criteria are not directed at protected speech, (2) the city's decision is supported by adjudicative findings that the effects that are proscribed by the conditional use criterion would result if the permit were granted, and (3) the city's decision is supported by substantial evidence. Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city council decision that has the effect of requiring petitioner to produce a traffic study with larger geographic scope than that required by city staff does not violate the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, absent a further showing that the city council has in fact imposed the traffic study requirement in a manner that discriminates against petitioner and in favor of others. Ontrack, Inc. v. City of Medford, 37 Or LUBA 472 (2000).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. OAR 660-012-0060 does not require that a local government impose exactions to ensure that impacts from a plan amendment do not violate Transportation Planning Rule Level of Service requirements. Dept. of Transportation v. Coos County, 35 Or LUBA 285 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Compliance with OAR 660-012-0060 does not deprive a property of all beneficial use, where the current comprehensive plan and zoning designations allow a range of uses that may generate any amount of traffic and are not subject to the rule. Dept. of Transportation v. Coos County, 35 Or LUBA 285 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A zoning ordinance that lacks provisions governing signs and that is nevertheless applied to evaluate whether a proposed billboard is an accessory use to industrial and commercial uses allowed in the relevant zone is not subject to facial challenge under Article I, section 8, as an ordinance directed at the content of speech or as a content-neutral ordinance that expressly prohibits speech. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A zoning ordinance that is not directed at the content of speech and does not expressly prohibit speech may be challenged under Article I, section 8, only on an as-applied basis. To prevail, an as-applied challenge to a decision denying a proposed billboard because it is not an accessory use to uses allowed in an industrial and commercial zone must demonstrate that the decision burdens the applicant's rights of free expression without a rational basis for doing so. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local government may constitutionally distinguish between signs related to on-premises uses, and signs related only to off-premises uses or services, and deny a proposed billboard because it is unrelated to the primary use of the property, where the city's evaluation of the relationship between the sign and the premise does not entail a content-based distinction, and the on-premises/off-premises distinction is a rational means to preserve the zone for allowed uses. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local government does not impermissibly favor commercial speech over noncommercial speech because it allows signs related to on-premises uses in an industrial and commercial zone and prohibits all others. That signs related to on-premises commercial uses are allowed while unrelated commercial and noncommercial signs are prohibited is an incidental consequence of the permissible distinction drawn between signs related to on- and off-premises uses. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A facial "takings" challenge of a mandatory public acquisition ordinance, while not subject to the "ripeness" requirement, must nevertheless demonstrate that the ordinance would "take" petitioner's property and that the taking would be uncompensated. Nike, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 35 Or LUBA 57 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The key to determining whether an approval standard is unconstitutionally vague is whether a reasonable applicant could understand what must be done to comply with the standard. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 34 Or LUBA 1 (1998).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the accumulation of sand on petitioner's beachfront property is caused by time and nature, and not city's sand removal regulations, denial of petitioner's permit request to remove the sand does not fall within the "physical invasion" category of takings cases. Beta Trust v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 576 (1997).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution does not prohibit a county from limiting park ownership in EFU zones to fee owners because such a classification is not closed to petitioner nor is it based on antecedent personal or social status or characteristics. R/C Pilots Association v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 532 (1997).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. There is no violation of the right to equal privileges and immunities under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution or the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in applying a code provision to deny an absentee landowner permission to remove a tree, where the code does not create a separate classification for absentee landowners and the record does not show that any of the applications previously denied by the city were submitted by absentee landowners. Lindstedt v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 516 (1997).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In order to claim inequality of treatment as a class, petitioner must be a member of a true class whose disparate treatment is by virtue of characteristics they have apart from the law in question. A local code provision establishing criteria that must be met in specified circumstances to approve removal of a tree does not create such a true class. Lindstedt v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 516 (1997).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The city's denial of a tree cutting permit does not result in an unconstitutional "taking" of the portion of petitioner's property defined by the "circumference and diameter of the foliage and surface of roots of the tree," where petitioner retains "some beneficial use" of the property and is left with "an economically viable use" of the property. The "rough proportionality" test of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374 (1994), does not apply to land use decisions that merely limit the available uses of property. Lindstedt v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 516 (1997).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In adopting land use regulations, including emergency and temporary land use regulations, a city is bound by the substantive and procedural requirements established by ORS 197.610 and Statewide Planning Goals 1 and 2. These statutory and Goal requirements must be followed notwithstanding contrary city charter provisions. Western PCS, Inc. v. City of Lake Oswego, 33 Or LUBA 369 (1997).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will reject petitioners' claims that amendments to the city zoning ordinance are "class legislation" that violates certain property owners' right to equal privileges and immunities under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution where any property owner may bring itself, on equal terms, within the "favored class." Downtown Community Assoc. v. City of Portland, 32 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To establish a privileges and immunities violation under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution, a petitioner must prove: (1) denial of a privilege granted to others; (2) membership in a true class, and (3) the legislative classification has no rational basis. Cummings v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 17 (1995).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition requiring an applicant for site plan approval for a fast food restaurant to design street improvements for hundreds of feet beyond the subject property boundaries does not meet the "rough proportionality" test established in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994). Clark v. City of Albany, 29 Or LUBA 325 (1995).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994), and J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 131 Or App 615, 887 P2d 360 (1994), findings in support of a condition requiring an applicant for site plan approval for a fast food restaurant to construct certain street and frontage improvements must compare traffic and other effects of development to required improvements. Clark v. City of Albany, 29 Or LUBA 325 (1995).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That a local code's definition of the term "taking" neither accurately nor completely reflects the opinions of appellate courts and LUBA regarding what constitutes a "taking" of private property for public use under the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution or Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the term "taking" is not used elsewhere in the code. DLCD v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 459 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That a local government determined a particular development is a "motel" and, therefore, is not subject to the restrictions on transient occupancy of dwelling units otherwise applicable under local ordinance, does not confer on that development any privilege not generally available to other similarly situated establishments, in violation of Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution. Kaady v. City of Cannon Beach, 27 Or LUBA 464 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. City and county ordinances requiring that owners of certain unincorporated property either annex or sign a consent to annexation before receiving sewer connection permits do not improperly infringe on such property owners' statutory right to vote on annexations. Bear Creek Valley San. Auth. v. City of Medford, 27 Or LUBA 328 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Ordinances requiring consents to annexation as a condition of receiving sewer service do not improperly coerce property owners to give up their right to vote on annexations simply because an objecting property owner may be forced to pay a LID benefit assessment for the cost of extending sewer service which the objecting property owner does not wish to receive. Any such benefit assessments may be challenged on that basis in a proper forum and will either be invalidated or sustained. Bear Creek Valley San. Auth. v. City of Medford, 27 Or LUBA 328 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition of approval requiring elimination of a one-foot "spite strip" separating a new street serving a subdivision from the adjoining property is reasonably related to the impacts of the proposed subdivision and, therefore, does not effect an unconstitutional "taking" under either the United States or Oregon Constitution. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 318 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the local code prohibits residential, but not commercial or industrial, development in certain wetlands, and includes density transfer provisions for residential developments limited by wetlands, but not for commercial or industrial developments, there is a rational basis to justify the disparate code treatment of residential versus commercial or industrial developments. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 318 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a proposed subdivision will add traffic to an abutting arterial street, although direct access to the subdivision will be provided by local streets, a local government approval condition requiring that the developer construct sidewalks, storm sewers and other frontage improvements along the portion of the arterial abutting the subdivision is reasonably related to the impacts of the proposed subdivision and is not an unconstitutional taking. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 318 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Vague approval standards in a local code will not be found to violate the Oregon Constitution's guarantee of equal privileges and immunities unless a petitioner demonstrates that such approval standards have in fact led to a policy unlawfully discriminating in favor of some persons against others. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the challenged decision concerns the application of zoning regulations that limit the permissible uses of the subject property, rather than zoning decisions made in contemplation of eventual acquisition of the subject property for public use, there is no unconstitutional taking if the decision allows petitioner "some beneficial use" of the property. Stern v. City of Portland, 26 Or LUBA 544 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The legal analyses applied to vagueness and overbreadth challenges under both the United States and Oregon Constitutions are essentially the same. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That a condition of approval contains an ambiguous term does not, of itself, establish the condition is unconstitutionally vague. Rather, some ambiguity is tolerated where the ambiguous language of a condition is circumscribed by reference to specific, non-vague regulations. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The issue in determining whether a condition of approval is unconstitutionally vague is whether a reasonable applicant could understand what must be done to comply with the condition. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unconstitutional overbreadth refers to legislative action having a sweep so broad that it unreasonably limits constitutionally protected activity. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where petitioners do not challenge findings that a condition of approval is reasonably related to mitigation of impacts associated with the particular development proposal, petitioners fail to establish the challenged action is overbroad. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution forbids the passage of any law absolutely and directly restraining free expression. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition of permit approval that prohibits remonstrance against the formation of an LID, but does not proscribe other kinds of objections to an LID, only limits the manner in which expression may be exercised and does not directly and absolutely restrain the exercise of free expression in violation of Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In Oregon, waiver of a constitutional right is uniformly held to be the voluntary relinquishment of a known right. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioner's claim that his business was treated differently from another business, in violation of Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution, because the other business was granted an "exemption" from a restrictive ordinance requirement, provides no basis for reversal or remand of the challenged decision where the decision does not purport to grant an "exemption" to any business. Kaady v. City of Cannon Beach, 26 Or LUBA 424 (1994)

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition of partition approval requiring that three existing driveways presently serving property to be partitioned be consolidated into a single driveway does not "take" a cognizable property interest, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution or Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution. Such a condition simply requires that a property owner exercise the property right of access differently. Kostenborder v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 440 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where there is a reasonable relationship between the development potential of a parcel to be divided and the impacts reasonably attributable to the divided parcel on the one hand, and the city's need to respond to legitimate traffic concerns on the other, and it would be more difficult to address such concerns when there are three parcels rather than a single parcel, notwithstanding the lack of current plans to develop the property further, a condition requiring consolidation of existing driveways is appropriate. Kostenborder v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 440 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a constitutional taking claim is not dependent upon a local government's adoption of a particular interpretation of an ordinance, in that denial of an application for development approval is a reasonably foreseeable possibility, a petitioner is required to raise taking claims during the local proceedings or waive the right to raise those issues at LUBA. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While a local government is not obliged to respond to a taking claim raised during the local proceedings, the local government should, in the first instance, have an opportunity to respond to a taking issue during the local proceedings. Where there is more than one possible interpretation of the local approval standards, the local government should have the opportunity to adopt an interpretation that is constitutional. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The purpose of the requirement under applicable federal and state constitutions that a "taking" claim be ripe, is to allow the reviewing body to know the nature and extent of permitted development before adjudicating the constitutionality of the regulations that purport to limit it. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That petitioners believe a local government will deny proposed development because it does not meet various approval standards, does not excuse petitioners from giving the local government the opportunity to make that decision for itself. Petitioners must make a good faith application for at least some of the conditional uses allowed in the applicable zoning district before a taking claim is ripe for review. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a petitioner has been denied permit approval, but has failed to seek approval of other allowable uses or seek a plan amendment or statewide planning goal exception, the petitioner's regulatory taking claims under the United States and Oregon Constitutions are not ripe for review. Lardy v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 567 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution, a land use regulation must allow a property owner some substantial beneficial use of his property, but there is no generally applicable right under that section to construct a dwelling on one's property. Lardy v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 567 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution and Fifth Avenue Corp. v. Washington Co., 282 Or 591, 581 P2d 50 (1978), a landowner must be compensated where land use regulations which designate his property for public use or public acquisition "inflict virtually irreversible damage." However, the "inflict virtually irreversible damage" test does not apply to other types of land use regulations which do not designate property for public use or public acquisition. Lardy v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 567 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A taking claim brought under the "inflict virtually irreversible damage" test articulated by the Oregon Supreme Court in Fifth Avenue Corp. v. Washington Co., 282 Or 591, 581 P2d 50 (1978), is not excused from the ripeness requirement. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will not presume it would be futile for petitioners to apply for a comprehensive plan amendment and zone change to make their taking claim ripe for review. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In order for petitioners' claims under Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution and the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, that their property was taken by a local government without just compensation, to be ripe for review, petitioners must show that listed permitted uses cannot be established on the subject property and that they were refused a plan and zone change and approval for other listed conditional uses. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local government's implementation of exclusive farm use zoning is not the equivalent of imposing a statutory conservation easement. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Both the Oregon and U.S. Constitutions require that there be a "reasonable relationship" between a challenged condition of approval and the impacts of, or needs generated by, the proposed development. Sherwood Baptist Church v. City of Sherwood, 24 Or LUBA 502 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a constitutional taking claim is not dependent upon a local government's adoption of a particular interpretation of an ordinance, in that denial of an application for development approval is a reasonably foreseeable possibility, a petitioner is required to raise taking claims during the local proceedings or waive the right to raise those issues at LUBA. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While a local government is not obliged to respond to a taking claim raised during the local proceedings, the local government should, in the first instance, have an opportunity to respond to a taking issue during the local proceedings. Where there is more than one possible interpretation of the local approval standards, the local government should at least have the opportunity, if possible, to adopt an interpretation that is constitutional. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The purpose of the requirement under applicable federal and state constitutions that a "taking" claim be ripe, is to allow the reviewing body to know the nature and extent of permitted development before adjudicating the constitutionality of the regulations that purport to limit it. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That petitioners believe a local government will deny proposed development because it might not meet various approval standards, does not excuse petitioners from giving the local government the opportunity to make that decision for itself. Accordingly, petitioners must make a good faith application for at least some of the conditional uses allowed in the underlying zoning district before a taking claim is ripe for review. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An evidentiary hearing at LUBA will not be allowed to show that many, but not all, conditionally permitted uses listed in the applicable zoning district are economically infeasible, where petitioners do not argue that it would have been futile to apply for approval of the other conditionally permitted uses. Under these circumstances, the evidence petitioners seek to introduce would not establish an unconstitutional "taking." Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 591 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a petitioner alleges a land use decision results in a taking under Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution, but relies entirely on arguments advanced in support of allegations that the decision constitutes a taking under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, LUBA will limit its review to petitioner's federal taking claim. Nelson v. Benton County, 23 Or LUBA 392 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where petitioner seeks to establish through an evidentiary hearing that all nonresidential uses allowed outright or conditionally under the existing zone are not economically feasible on the subject property, but has not sought approval of a plan and zone map amendment which would allow residential development of the subject property, petitioner's state constitution taking claim is not ripe for adjudication and petitioner's motion for evidentiary hearing will be denied. Dority v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 384 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under both the Oregon and Federal constitutions, taking claims must be ripe for adjudication before LUBA may review their merits. Where petitioners did not seek any form of administrative relief from the applicable regulations, and did not seek either a variance or a plan and zone map change, petitioners' taking claims are not ripe. Schoppert v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 138 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioner's unsupported assertions that the subject parcel is not suited for any use other than a nonresource dwelling are not a sufficient basis for excusing petitioner from the requirement that he seek approval for other uses potentially allowed under the applicable zone before pursuing a taking claim under the Oregon or United States Constitution. In any case, a petitioner is required to seek quasi-judicial plan and zone map amendments prior to pursuing a taking claim. Joyce v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 116 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local code criterion requiring that a request for land use approval be in the "public interest" does not require that the local government determine whether denial of the request would constitute a taking of private property without just compensation in violation of Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution or the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a local government is not required to consider whether denying a request for land use approval would constitute an unconstitutional taking of private property without just compensation, a local government's findings on such constitutional issues provide no basis for reversal or remand. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unlike a local government, LUBA is specifically required by statute to consider arguments that a local government decision is unconstitutional and to reverse or remand an unconstitutional decision. Therefore, procedural errors a local government may have committed in considering constitutional issues during local proceedings are harmless errors. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Zoning regulations limiting the allowable forest and nonforest uses of property located within a forest zone do not constitute a nuisance or physical invasion of such private property. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution, private property is not impermissibly taken for public use without just compensation, so long as the landowner is allowed "some substantial beneficial use" of the property. Fifth Avenue Corp. v. Washington Co., 282 Or 591, 609, 581 P2d 50 (1978). Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In view of the Oregon Supreme Court's explicit reservation of judgment concerning whether it will look to U.S. Supreme Court Fifth Amendment "takings" jurisprudence to further develop the appropriate tests to be applied in considering Article I, section 18, takings claims under the Oregon Constitution, LUBA will not do so. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where there is expert testimony in the record that the subject property can produce a net profit if properly managed for forest use, and the conclusion of the owner's expert that there is limited existing and future value in forest use of the property is based as much on deficiencies in forest management practices as on inherent limitations of the property, the landowners have a substantial beneficial use of their property. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where property was not legally partitioned until after the applicable zoning district was amended to limit dwellings to those necessary for and accessory to forest uses, and the property owners' predecessors in interest received notice of the zoning ordinance amendment, the owners may not fail to consider the uncertainty of receiving approval for a dwelling in agreeing to a purchase price and thereafter use the price of the property as a basis for contending their property has been unconstitutionally taken without compensation. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioners must seek relief from application of a velocity flooding overlay designation to the subject property through the variance process provided in the local government's flood damage prevention ordinance, before they may obtain LUBA review of any constitutional "taking" claims. Alexiou v. Curry County, 22 Or LUBA 639 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution requires that there be a "reasonable relationship" between a condition of approval and the impacts of or needs generated by the proposed development. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 22 Or LUBA 617 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a proposed larger building and paved parking area will increase the amount of impervious surfaces on the subject property and, therefore, runoff into an adjacent creek, there is a "reasonable relationship" between the proposed development and a condition requiring land along the creek to be dedicated for a planned greenway for management of storm water runoff. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 22 Or LUBA 617 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a significantly larger retail sales building and parking lot will accommodate larger numbers of customers and employees and their vehicles, there is a reasonable relationship between alleviating these impacts of the development and a condition requiring dedication of land for a pedestrian/bicycle pathway as an alternative means of transportation. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 22 Or LUBA 617 (1992).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the evidence cited by the parties supports only a conclusion that production of forest products, a permitted use in the subject zone, is a feasible economic use of the subject property, petitioners fail to demonstrate they are precluded from making any economic use of the subject property and their claim of violation of Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution will be denied. Wickwire v. Clackamas County, 21 Or LUBA 278 (1991).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Legislation preempting certain city and county land use decision making and rights of appeal concerning a proposed mass transportation facility does not violate constitutional home rule provisions because such legislation is a "general law addressed primarily to substantive social, economic, or other regulatory objectives of the state," and is not "irreconcilable with the local community's freedom to choose its own political form." La Grande/Astoria v. PERB, 281 Or 137, 156, 576 P2d 1204 (1978). Seto v. Tri-Met, 21 Or LUBA 185 (1991).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A law adopted to facilitate decision making concerning a mass transit system which will be part of a regional transportation system serving a large number of cities and counties and a significant percentage of the state's population is a "general law addressed primarily to substantive social, economic, or other regulatory objectives of the state" even though only three cities and two counties are directly affected by the law. La Grande/Astoria v. PERB, 281 Or 137, 156, 576 P2d 1204 (1978). Seto v. Tri-Met, 21 Or LUBA 185 (1991).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Constitutional home rule provisions do not prohibit the legislature from adopting substantive legislation in an area where local governments are also permitted to legislate. Seto v. Tri-Met, 21 Or LUBA 185 (1991).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Different treatment under the law does not necessarily amount to a violation of constitutional rights to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution or equal privileges and immunities under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution. Where petitioners fail to explain why the different treatment amounts to a violation of those constitutional provisions, petitioners' constitutional challenges will be rejected. Seto v. Tri-Met, 21 Or LUBA 185 (1991).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioners' challenge to a condition of development approval as a taking, contrary to the Oregon Constitution, cannot be upheld if a variance process in the local code is an available administrative means for petitioners to seek relief from the disputed condition. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 20 Or LUBA 411 (1991).

2.1.2 Constitutional Law – Oregon Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Neither the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution nor the equal privileges and immunities provision of Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution requires a local decision maker to adhere to a prior erroneous interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy. Reeder v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 238 (1990).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. In a motion to take evidence outside the record pursuant to OAR 661-010-0045(1), and (2)(a) and (c), petitioners' argument—that two city employees violated petitioners' rights under the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution because the employees engaged in the "unequal" application of the applicable standards in processing two similarly situated planned unit development (PUD) projects—fails to demonstrate that the proffered evidence would concern "procedural irregularities not shown in the record and which, if proved, would warrant reversal or remand of the decision" because petitioners do not allege that the final decision maker violated petitioners' constitutional rights. Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. To succeed in a motion to take evidence outside the record and pursuant to OAR 661-010-0045(1), and (2)(a) and (c), regarding an alleged violation of petitioners' rights under the privileges and immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, the movant must develop a legal theory and a set of factual assertions sufficient to allow LUBA to determine how consideration of the proffered evidence would "affect the outcome of the review proceeding." Conte v. City of Eugene, 76 Or LUBA 498 (2017).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. A petitioner's constitutional challenge to a city's denial of a business license fee exemption, in its appeal of a land use permit decision, is premature for two reasons. First, the challenged decision only requires business licenses, without specifying whether exemptions to the business license fee might apply. Second, because the city took the position at LUBA that it intended to deny the business license exemption, and the decision failed to include finding on that issue, the decision must be remanded for response findings. Bend/Sisters Garden RV Resort, LLC v. City of Sisters, 72 Or LUBA 200 (2015).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. There is no right under the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to cross-examination in quasi-judicial land use hearings in Oregon. Emmert v. Clackamas County, 65 Or LUBA 1 (2012).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Absent citation to any convincing authority, LUBA will not find that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires the county to notify petitioner or any other party when an item is submitted into the record. Emmert v. Clackamas County, 65 Or LUBA 1 (2012).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Before considering a petitioner's constitutional arguments under an assignment of error, LUBA will first consider whether there is a subconstitutional basis for resolving the assignment of error that would make it unnecessary to resolve the constitutional argument. Families for a Quarry Free Neighborhood v. Lane County, 64 Or LUBA 297 (2011).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Even assuming that OAR 661-010-0075(11), which provides that LUBA shall dismiss an appeal of a decision that is not reviewable as a land use decision, unless a motion to transfer to circuit court is filed within 14 days of the date any party or LUBA raises the jurisdictional issue, is inconsistent with ORS 34.102(4) or the federal due process clause, LUBA lacks authority to reconsider its final opinion to change the disposition of the appeal, in response to a motion to transfer filed after LUBA issued its final opinion dismissing the appeal. Any error that LUBA may commit in issuing the final opinion can only be corrected by appeal to the Court of Appeals. Maguire v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 478 (2011).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Code procedures that distinguish between "Type II" permit decisions that can be made without an initial hearing, with an opportunity for affected persons to appeal to a de novo hearing, and "Type III" permit decisions that require an initial hearing, do not violate the privileges and immunities clause by granting "privileges" to participants of Type III proceedings that are denied Type II participants. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 56 Or LUBA 240 (2008).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where the local code does not provide procedures or standards governing a specific decision, the local government may, consistent with the federal due process clause, borrow and apply procedures and standards applicable to other types of decisions. Emami v. City of Lake Oswego, 52 Or LUBA 18 (2006).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where a local government has no procedures governing a particular type of decision, it is consistent with the federal due process clause to adopt a written set of procedures and standards that significantly cabin the local government's discretion and that offer all participants a reasonable opportunity to present evidence and argument. That such procedures are one-time and temporary in nature, rather than permanent code provisions does not offend the due process clause. Emami v. City of Lake Oswego, 52 Or LUBA 18 (2006).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. A city commits no error in proceeding with a decision on an application for a subdivision, and does not violate a subdivision opponent's due process rights, where a quiet title action is pending to resolve an ownership dispute between the opponent and the subdivision applicant, but the applicant is the record fee owner of the property. McFall v. City of Sherwood, 44 Or LUBA 493 (2003).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. A conditional use permit condition of approval that the applicants terminate a special events business that was operated as part of a permitted bed and breakfast inn does not unconstitutionally impose an overbroad or vague limit on the bed and breakfast owners' constitutionally protected religious activity and speech. Cookman v. Marion County, 44 Or LUBA 630 (2003).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. That conditional use permit applicants for approval of a bed and breakfast home occupation may not have been aware that the conditional use permit would be conditioned on the applicants terminating a special events business that the county concluded was not allowed in the county's EFU zone does not violate the applicants' rights to due process where they were allowed: (1) to challenge the administrative decision in a quasi-judicial hearing before a hearings officer, (2) to appeal the hearings officer's decision to the board of county commissioners, (3) to appeal that decision to LUBA, and (4) would be entitled to seek judicial review of LUBA's decision. Cookman v. Marion County, 44 Or LUBA 630 (2003).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Absent a legal requirement that local governments provide a quasi-judicial UGB amendment process, petitioner fails to establish that it has a constitutionally protected due process interest to a quasi-judicial forum for invoking state and local UGB amendment standards. Homebuilders Assoc. v. Metro, 42 Or LUBA 176 (2002).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where a city allows one party more time to present oral testimony during a land use hearing than is allowed another party, the unequal allocation of time will not constitute error so long as the city's decision explains the reason for the differentiation, there is an unlimited opportunity to submit written testimony, and the unequal allocation of time does not cause substantial prejudice. Kane v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 183 (2000).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. An assignment of error fails to raise a justiciable controversy where it merely asks the Board to declare that, in future hypothetical cases where the city applies an allegedly unconstitutional ordinance, LUBA will deny any motions to dismiss arguing that the appeal is not ripe or the petitioner has failed to exhaust administrative remedies. Lincoln City Ch. of Comm. v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 399 (1999).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. An enumeration of alleged procedural irregularities, without analysis, does not amount to a reviewable claim of a constitutional violation. Fechtig v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 410 (1996).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Petitioners do not establish the county made a decision in violation of their federal due process right to be heard, on the basis that the county board of commissioners conducted a staff briefing at which it instructed its staff to inform petitioners that it intended to comply with its ordinance provision regarding the conduct of appeal hearings. Canfield v. Yamhill County, 31 Or LUBA 25 (1998).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where petitioner makes no distinction in his brief between state and federal constitutional issues, LUBA cannot consider his constitutional arguments. Fence v. Jackson County, 30 Or LUBA 265 (1995).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Due process does not require an extension of time to file a local appeal of a land use decision where procedural defects in the notice of decision were unrelated to petitioner's failure to mount a timely challenge to the decision. Thomas v. Wasco County, 30 Or LUBA 142 (1995).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Failure to waive a local appeal fee violates no federal constitutional rights of due process or access to the courts; ORS 215.422(1)(c) does not create a right to a free appeal. Cummings v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 17 (1995).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Petitioner's arguments that the local government's refusal to allow him to cross-examine witnesses, refusal to allow him to present evidence during its final hearing, and failure to explain his procedural rights do not establish he was denied due process of law, where petitioner never requested a right to cross-examine witnesses, does not explain why the evidentiary hearings the local government provided were inadequate, and makes no attempt to identify the procedural rights he believes should have been explained. Sanchez v. Clatsop County, 29 Or LUBA 26 (1995).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. A local government may not delegate to any particular group of citizens standardless authority to veto a request for land use approval. Such consent ordinances deny the permit applicant due process and violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. A local code provision that imposes different approval procedures for vacation rental dwellings if a specified number of affected property owners object does not constitute a consent ordinance and does not deny the permit applicant due process. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. A city's exercise of its zoning power to regulate vacation rental dwellings to ensure streets are adequate to handle the traffic that such dwellings will generate, and that impacts of such dwellings on the neighborhood will be minimal, is not arbitrary and does not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Where a challenged ordinance requires discontinuation of a use after expiration of a five-year amortization period, but also allows a property owner to apply for hardship relief if such property owner can substantiate that an investment made exclusively in the nonconforming use cannot be adequately amortized within the five-year period specified by such ordinance, property owners have no basis to contend their property has been taken until they have applied for and been denied the hardship relief. Cope v. City of Cannon Beach, 23 Or LUBA 233 (1992).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. There is nothing unconstitutional about providing only published notice of legislative rezoning. Sabin v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 23 (1990).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Petitioner's claim that the city erroneously refused to provide a transcript of proceedings before a hearings officer for his appeal of the hearings officer's decision to the city council will be denied where petitioner (1) identifies no code section requiring the city to provide a transcript, and (2) fails to develop an argument in support of his contention that due process requires that a transcript be provided. Vestibular Disorders Consult. v. City of Portland, 19 Or LUBA 94 (1990).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. Although petitioners have a right under the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution to an unbiased decision maker, petitioners have the burden of establishing that the decision maker was incapable of making a decision on the basis of the evidence and argument before him. LUBA will not infer that a decision maker had actual bias solely because he and a party to the proceeding were business associates. Torgeson v. City of Canby, 19 Or LUBA 511 (1990).

2.2.1 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Procedural Issues. When alleging that their rights to due process under the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution were violated because of bias by the local decision maker, petitioners must show that the local decision maker was incapable of making a decision on the basis of the evidence and argument before it. Eckis v. Linn County, 19 Or LUBA 15 (1990).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Arguments that a local code provision required the local government to deny an application when it concluded that another local code provision was not met provide no basis for reversal or remand absent a challenge to the local government's primary conclusion that it could not, consistent with the Fifth Amendment, deny the application for failure to meet the second provision. Southwest Hills Residential League v. City of Portland, 81 Or LUBA 778 (2020).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Schultz v. City of Grants Pass, 131 Or App 220, 884 P2d 569 (1994), where property can be physically developed without further land use review, i.e., with uses that are allowed outright, then some level of exactions could be appropriate at the partition stage, even if physical development is not part of the partition application; however, where nothing in the local code or elsewhere requires the local government to impose exactions at the partition stage, the local government's decision not to exact provides no basis for remand. Dressel v. City of Tigard, 81 Or LUBA 208 (2020).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because the law regarding the application of RLUIPA's Equal Terms provision to particular local zoning provisions is unsettled, and because conflicts exist between decisions from courts in the various federal circuits that have applied the Equal Terms provision to specific local zoning ordinances, it will be a rare occurrence where a party challenging a local government decision regarding RLUIPA will "present[] a position without probable cause to believe the position was well-founded in law" for purposes of awarding attorney fees under ORS 197.830(15)(b). Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 80 Or LUBA 1026 (2019).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. When the Court of Appeals remands a LUBA decision that affirmed a local government decision requiring a condition of approval that petitioner argued constituted an unconstitutional exaction of property prohibited by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, because the Court of Appeals agreed with petitioner that the dedication is unconstitutional unless the hearings officer finds that the impacts of the proposed development would substantially impede the governmental interest advanced by the city's standards which the conditions of approval were imposed to meet, LUBA will remand that portion of the decision to the hearings officer for reconsideration where the hearings officer adopted no findings on that point. Hill v. City of Portland, 78 Or LUBA 334 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a city code provides that a property owner must, as a condition of permit or partition approval, either provide the improvements or pay into an improvement fund if a street adjoining property without direct access to the street does not have standard full-width improvements, and petitioner argues that the code provision is not applicable to his proposed property partition, LUBA will sustain, in part, petitioner's challenge upon remand from the Court of Appeals, where the arguments on appeal have evolved and it is apparent that remand is necessary for the hearings officer to adopt findings regarding LUBA's underlying conclusion that the hearings officer was correct in concluding that the condition requiring a waiver of remonstrance against a street or stormwater facility improvement was justified under Clark v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 375, 380, aff'd, 144 Or App 192, 924 P2d 877 (1966), and did not constitute a taking. Hill v. City of Portland, 78 Or LUBA 334 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While the county presumably has a legitimate governmental interest in preserving wildlife migration corridors, under RLUIPA, 42 USC § 2000cc et seq., the county cannot treat religious assemblies in the wildlife area (WA) Overlay zone on less favorable terms than non-religious assemblies with similar impacts on wildlife. Accordingly, the board of county commissioners correctly concluded that the express exclusion of churches in the county code from the WA overlay zone, while allowing nonreligious assemblies and institutions as conditional uses, violates the so-called Equal Terms provision of RLUIPA because churches are not treated equally. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 78 Or LUBA 516 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the county found that county code provisions, which expressly exclude churches in the wildlife area (WA) Overlay zone, while allowing nonreligious assemblies and institutions as conditional uses, violate the Equal Terms provision of RLUIPA, 42 USC § 2000cc et seq., under the Article VI of the United States Constitution, the Supremacy Clause, a county would almost certainly lack authority to deny applications for a proposed church located on property within the WA overlay zone, based on nonconformance with local or state regulations that the county had concluded cannot be applied to the proposed use consistently with RLUIPA. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 78 Or LUBA 516 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where LUBA concludes a county provision violates the so-called Equal Terms provision of RLUIPA, 42 USC § 2000cc et seq., which focuses on protecting religious assembly from unequal treatment, petitioner's argument that intervenors' religious use of their dwelling does not qualify as a "church," and therefore that ORS 215.441 does not apply to authorize activities customarily associated with the practice of the religious activity, does not provide a basis for us to remand the decision. Even if intervenors' religious use of their dwelling and property does not constitute a "church" for purposes of ORS 215.441 or ORS 215.283(1)(a), that has no bearing on whether the county is obligated, under the Equal Terms provision, to treat religious assemblies and institutions no less favorably than secular assemblies and institutions. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 78 Or LUBA 516 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Brown v. City of Medford, 251 Or App 42, 47, 283 P3d 367 (2012), sets forth the two-part test that is applied to determine the constitutionality of an "exaction" under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. First, under Nollan v. California Coastal Comm'n, 483 US 825, 831-32, 107 S Ct 3141, 97 L Ed 677 (1987), the exaction must "substantially advance the same government interest that would furnish a valid ground for denial of the development permit." Second, under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), "the nature and extent of the exaction must be 'roughly proportional' to the effect of the proposed development." Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To determine whether a local government's conditions of approval satisfy the Nollan v. California Coastal Comm'n, 483 US 825, 831-32, 107 S Ct 3141, 97 L Ed 677 (1987), "essential nexus" prong of the two-part test for assessing the constitutionality of a government exaction, the local government must show "(1) what interests would allow the [local government] to deny [the applicant's proposed land] partition, and (2) how the exaction would serve those interests." Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a city has two separate criteria—a transportation impacts criterion, and a services and utilities criterion—both of which are generally concerned with achieving and maintaining an adequate and safe transportation system, and both criteria must be satisfied, a finding that one of those criteria is satisfied does not necessarily mean the other criterion is satisfied. In such a situation, simply because the city found no "traffic impacts" requiring mitigation under the traffic impacts criterion does not mean the city imposed an unconstitutional exaction when it required right-of-way dedication and street improvements as conditions of approval to satisfy the services and utilities criterion. It simply means the city applies the rights-of-way requirements through the services and utilities criterion, rather than the transportation impacts criterion. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To determine whether "the nature and extent of the exaction is 'roughly proportional' to the effect of the proposed development" under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 391, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), "[n]o precise mathematical calculation is required, but the city must make some sort of individualized determination that the required dedication is related both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development." Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. As part of the "rough[] proportional[ity]" test under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), a hearings officer commits no error when he or she identifies and relies upon potential "sub-impacts" of a proposed development, including street infrastructure wear and tear, pollution and safety, which may not be readily quantifiable, in conjunction with a quantifiable motor vehicle trip generation analysis to determine whether the impacts of the proposed development are "roughly proportional" to the required right-of-way dedication. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. As part of the "rough[] proportional[ity]" test under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 384, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), although a local government's decision to compare the percentage of total trips in the area that can be attributed to the development proposal and the exaction's percentage of the total area of the subject property can be accused of comparing apples and oranges, that argument does not provide a basis for remand or reversal, because that criticism is possible in most cases where a Dolan "rough[] proportional[ity] analysis is required. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A waiver of remonstrance to the formation of a local improvement district (LID) is not subject to the constitutional exaction analysis because it, by itself, does not result in a loss of petitioner's property. Conditions of approval, such as a waiver of remonstrance, may be applied by a local government to ensure that a development proposal conforms to the applicable approval criteria or to ensure the enforcement of other local government regulations. Hill v. City of Portland, 77 Or LUBA 317 (2018).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The courts have generally adopted a two-tiered approach to so-called "dormant" Commerce Clause challenges under the U.S. Constitution: When a state or local law facially discriminates against interstate commerce, or when its purpose or practical effect is to favor in-state economic interests over out-of-state interests, courts have generally struck down the law without further inquiry, under an elevated level of scrutiny. Where the law is facially non-discriminatory, and does not discriminate against out-of-state economic interests in its purpose or practical effect, the courts engage in a balancing test, subject to a lesser level of scrutiny, that weighs the state's interests against the indirect burden on interstate commerce. Such a law will only be struck down when the burden on interstate commerce is "clearly excessive" in relation to the putative local benefits. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where city ordinance text amendments effectively prohibit fossil fuel export terminals and limit existing terminals to serving local fossil fuel needs, the amendments discriminate against out-of-state interests in purpose and practical effect and violate the "dormant" Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution unless the city identifies a legitimate local interest and demonstrates that the local interest cannot be adequately served by reasonably nondiscriminatory alternatives. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where due to a city's geographic position astride a major trade route an ordinance prohibiting new or expanded fossil fuel terminals would have some impact on interstate and international commerce, and the local benefits served by the ordinance are attenuated at best, the ordinance violates the dormant Commerce Clause under the balancing test articulated in Pike v. Bruce Church, 397 US 137, 90 S Ct 844 (1970), which provides that nondiscriminatory regulations with incidental effects on interstate commerce are valid unless the burden imposed on interstate commerce is "clearly excessive" in relation to the putative local benefits. Columbia Pacific v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 15 (2017).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. No unconstitutional exaction of private property occurs when a city requires an applicant to improve to the width, grade and materials standards designated by the city engineer a newly created pathway that was approved and required as part of a previously approved partition of the property. Such a requirement does not run afoul of Koontz v. St. Johns Water Management District, 570 US 595, 133 S Ct 2586, 186 L Ed 2d 697 (2013), because requiring the pathway to be improved makes it usable by the occupants of the dwellings on the newly created parcels and by the public. Locke v. City of Portland, 76 Or LUBA 423 (2017).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will reject arguments that applying a county prohibition on churches in deer winter range would cause the county to violate the "equal terms" provision of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), because the county has allegedly allowed wedding event venues and similar uses on nearby properties, where the applicant does not argue or demonstrate that nearby properties are also subject to winter range restrictions or otherwise similarly zoned and situated as the subject property. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 75 Or LUBA 284 (2017).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A development standard requiring a developer to dedicate and improve adjoining roads to city half-street standards "to the extent the city demonstrates consistency with constitutional requirements" merely acknowledges that the city's ability to require dedications and improvements may be limited by the Takings Clause of the U.S. Constitution, and is not properly understood to allow city staff to waive the code requirements on a case-by-case basis without any analysis or explanation. McCollough v. City of Eugene, 74 Or LUBA 573 (2016).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. State constitutional provisions may be more protective than similarly worded federal constitutional provisions, and therefore that federal courts have interpreted the analogous federal constitutional provision more narrowly than state courts have interpreted the state constitutional provision has no bearing on the meaning of the state constitutional provision. Iberdrola Renewables v. Umatilla County, 67 Or LUBA 149 (2013).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a state constitutional provision resolves the controversy and provides the petitioner with a complete remedy, LUBA should decline to reach issues under an analogous federal constitutional provision. Iberdrola Renewables v. Umatilla County, 67 Or LUBA 149 (2013).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will deny a motion to take evidence of a city's post-adoption actions to enforce a sign ordinance on appeal, where the petitioner's challenge to the sign ordinance is necessarily a facial challenge, and the petitioner fails to demonstrate that evidence of the city's post-adoption enforcement actions would be relevant or determinative of any facial challenge. Claus v. City of Sherwood, 66 Or LUBA 460 (2012).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will deny a motion to take evidence that a city has applied its sign ordinance by its terms to require that temporary signs be constructed in a "colonial post style," where the petitioner advances a facial challenge to the ordinance itself, and evidence that the city has applied the ordinance by its terms could add nothing to any facial constitutional challenge to the ordinance. Claus v. City of Sherwood, 66 Or LUBA 460 (2012).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will deny a motion to take evidence that a city has applied its sign ordinance in an unequal or discriminatory fashion, where the petitioner fails to demonstrate that the city's actual post-hoc pattern of enforcement is probative to a facial challenge to the sign ordinance itself. Claus v. City of Sherwood, 66 Or LUBA 460 (2012).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county ordinance that allows a private residential landowner or a city council to "waive" a two-mile setback from wind towers and substitute a lesser or no setback violates the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution, because it grants wind tower project neighbors the arbitrary and standardless power to determine whether and to what extent there is a setback for wind tower development. Cosner v. Umatilla County, 65 Or LUBA 9 (2012).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the conservation easement required as a condition of permit approval would essentially make the burdened property part of a public surface water management system and transfer several important sticks in the bundle of property rights formerly held by the fee owner, the easement is correctly viewed as an "exaction," subject to the rough proportionality requirement under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 391, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). Tonquin Holdings LLC v. Clackamas County, 64 Or LUBA 68 (2011).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To raise an issue of constitutional violation with sufficient specificity for purposes of ORS 197.763(1), at a minimum the constitutional provision at issue must be cited or the substance of the constitutional provision argued to the decision maker. A claim for relief from setbacks required under a wetland protection zone is not sufficient to put the decision maker on notice that the petitioner believes that denial of relief would violate the federal Takings Clause. Bundy v. City of West Linn, 63 Or LUBA 113 (2011).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A petitioner's allegations that the city mayor cut off his oral testimony to censor the content of petitioner's testimony is not supported by the record, where the mayor gave the petitioner the same amount of time to speak as other participants and there is no indication in the record that the mayor's attempt to hold petitioner to the announced three-minute time limit was based on the content of petitioner's testimony. Claus v. City of Sherwood, 62 Or LUBA 67 (2010).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Without a protected property interest to continued use of a particular access to an arterial, a property owner has no takings claim under the Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution or the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution when the Oregon Department of Transportation adopts a plan to close that access and require the property owner to use an alternative route to access to that arterial. Parker Johnstone Wilsonville Honda v. ODOT, 62 Or LUBA 116 (2010).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An ordinance requiring that developers of residential property near an airport grant the airport an uncompensated "avigation easement" that allows the airport to subject the property to noise, vibrations, fumes, dust and fuel particle emissions is facially inconsistent with the federal and state Takings Clauses, because the easement does not advance the governmental interest in reducing land use conflicts between the airport and surrounding residential uses. Under the easement, the conflicts will exist to the same degree; the only arguable effect is to make it more difficult for the property owner to advance a successful inverse condemnation or other legal action against the airport. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city ordinance that explicitly and unequivocally requires that land use applicants comply with all environmental laws "as they may be amended from time to time" is inconsistent with the Oregon Constitution Article I, section 21, prohibition on delegation of the power to amend legislation. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city ordinance requiring that land use applicants comply with "currently applicable" standards of a port district does not violate the Oregon Constitution Article I, section 21, prohibition on delegation of the power to amend legislation, because it can be construed to refer to port standards as they exist on the date the ordinance was adopted. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city airport zone that authorizes air passenger and freight services at a regional airport consistent with the levels identified in the airport's master plan, which does not currently authorize such services, violates the Oregon Constitution Article I, section 21, delegation clause, because it effectively delegates to the airport the authority to determine what uses are allowed in the airport zone. Barnes v. City of Hillsboro, 61 Or LUBA 375 (2010).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. For purposes of the equal terms provision of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, an "assembly" is a place where groups or individuals dedicated to similar social, educational or recreational purposes meet to pursue those interests, and includes golf courses, and private or public parks. Young v. Jackson County, 58 Or LUBA 64 (2008).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The legal question under the equal terms provision of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) is whether the applicable zoning scheme allows religious assemblies on less equal terms than non-religious assemblies, with respect to the regulatory objective. That question is primarily resolved by examining the text of the applicable zoning scheme, and a claimant under RLUIPA is not generally required to produce traffic studies or other evidence comparing the adverse impacts of religious and non-religious assemblies. Young v. Jackson County, 58 Or LUBA 64 (2008).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While the state may have a compelling interest in preserving agricultural land and the integrity of urban growth boundaries, that interest does not justify an administrative rule that prohibits churches on agricultural land within three miles of an urban growth boundary while allowing golf courses and similar non-religious assemblies that appear to impact the state interest to the same degree. Therefore, the rule prohibition on churches on agricultural land within three miles of an urban growth boundary is inconsistent with the equal terms provision of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act. Young v. Jackson County, 58 Or LUBA 64 (2008).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the "rough proportionality" test in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d (1994), applies, it can function as a kind of variance, providing a basis under which a local government may choose not to exact property as a condition of development approval that it would otherwise be entitled to exact under its land use regulations, as an alternative to compensating the landowner for the taking. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 58 Or LUBA 235 (2009).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even if the Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d (1994), "rough proportionality" test does not apply to exactions not requiring the dedication of a property interest, where a county road standard includes a provision prohibiting the county from requiring road improvements that are not "roughly proportional" to the impact of the proposed development on public facilities and services, the county may apply its local rough proportionality test in determining whether to grant requested variances from county road standards. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 58 Or LUBA 235 (2009).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county does not err in concluding that requiring a development applicant to improve a substandard local street to full collector street standards is not roughly proportional to the impacts of a proposed Liquified Natural Gas terminal and therefore granting variances to some collector street standards, where in operation the terminal would produce only 150 daily trips, which combined with the existing 50 daily trips would fall below the threshold traffic range for a collector street. Columbia Riverkeeper v. Clatsop County, 58 Or LUBA 235 (2009).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Nelson v. Emerald People's Utility Dist., 318 Or 99, 862 P2d 1293 (1993), a prior decision involving an issue may preclude relitigation of the issue if, among other things, the issue was actually litigated and essential to a final decision on the merits. Where in a prior land use decision the hearings officer concluded that a city code provision is facially unconstitutional, but the hearings officer denied the petitioner's application on different grounds, the hearings officer's view regarding facial unconstitutionality is dicta and not "essential" to a final decision on the merits, and therefore does not preclude the hearings officer from reconsidering that view in a decision on petitioner's subsequent land use application. Kingsley v. City of Portland, 55 Or LUBA 256 (2007).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A code provision requiring dedication of a greenway is not facially unconstitutional simply because it does not explicitly require the city to conduct the proportionality analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). The city must conduct that analysis, where required by the United States Constitution, even if the local code does not require it. Kingsley v. City of Portland, 55 Or LUBA 256 (2007).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even if an overbreadth challenge can be advanced under the Takings Clause or under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), a code provision requiring dedication of a greenway is not unconstitutionally overbroad where the provision does not prohibit the city from conducting a Dolan analysis prior to imposing the dedication. Kingsley v. City of Portland, 55 Or LUBA 256 (2007).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even if a decision can be understood to grant an adjoining landowner the exclusive right to use a portion of a public right-of-way that the petitioner's predecessor-in-interest had dedicated to the city for public use, petitioner no longer has any property interest in the right-of-way and therefore the decision cannot possibly take petitioner's property. Brodersen v. City of Ashland, 55 Or LUBA 350 (2007).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a local government's only claimed basis for imposing an exaction that requires off-site road improvements is that a subdivision would otherwise violate a code standard regarding street system impacts, and LUBA finds that the local government has not established that the subdivision would violate the code standard, there is also no basis to impose the exaction. PacWest II, Inc. v. City of Madras, 53 Or LUBA 241 (2007).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Federal law preempts a local determination that a proposed cellular communications facility is unsafe where the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) has issued a "Determination of No Hazard" under FAA rules. U.S. Cellular v. Klamath County, 53 Or LUBA 442 (2007).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Evidence of the availability of alternative properties zoned to allow a proposed religious use may be critical to any demonstration that denial of a proposed religious use substantially burdens religious exercise under the federal Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). Such evidence may not be necessary or relevant where the record establishes that the subject property has a particular religious significance. Timberline Baptist Church v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 374 (2006).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a zone prohibits a particular use, the "substantial burden" under RLUIPA is the burden of acquiring suitable property located within zones where the proposed use is allowed. Timberline Baptist Church v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 374 (2006).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Denial of a proposed religious school is not a substantial burden under RLUIPA, where the record indicates that the petitioner could acquire property zoned to allow the proposed school, and thus denial of the school on property owned by petitioner does not pressure or force the petitioner to choose between following a religious precept and forfeiting approval of the school, or force petitioner to abandon a religious precept in order to obtain approval. Timberline Baptist Church v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 374 (2006).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To demonstrate that denial of a proposed religious school substantially burdens religious exercise, it is insufficient to show that no alternative properties zoned to allow a school are currently for sale. The burden of seeking out suitable properties and contacting owners of land not for sale, as other land developers frequently must do, is not a substantial burden. Timberline Baptist Church v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 374 (2006).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A church's particular financial circumstances and its ability or inability to afford land that is otherwise suitable and available on which to construct a religious school is not a basis to conclude that denial of the proposed school on property not zoned for that use substantially burdens the church's free exercise rights. Timberline Baptist Church v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 374 (2006).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Given specific testimony that a church's religious mission requires operating a religious school on the same site as the church, the fact that the church currently operates a school on a separate site may not be a sufficient basis to reject the church's claim that denial of the school on the same site as the church is a substantial burden under RLUIPA. Timberline Baptist Church v. Washington County, 52 Or LUBA 374 (2006).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. There is no right under either the federal or Oregon constitution to vote on questions of incorporation or annexation. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a right to vote in a general election is extended by statute, any classification restricting that franchise on grounds other than residence, age, and citizenship must be shown to serve a compelling state interest. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In analyzing annexation statutes, if those statutes are viewed as restricting a statutory right to vote, strict scrutiny is generally applied under the Equal Protection Clause; but if those statutes are viewed as merely presenting alternative annexation methods, where some provide for elections and some do not, rational basis scrutiny is generally applied under the Equal Protection Clause. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The more clearly and cleanly statutes that authorize different annexation methods segregate the annexation methods that do not require elections from those that do, the more likely the statutes will not be subject to strict scrutiny as statutes that restrict voting rights. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. When statutes do not make it clear at the time an annexation is initiated whether the annexation will ultimately be subject to an election before the annexation can take effect, or the statutes appear to grant a right to vote on an annexation but also allow the election to be foreclosed at some later point in the annexation process, those statutes are likely to be subject to strict scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause as statutes that restrict voting rights. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The right to an election that ORS 222.111(5) grants is not an absolute right. There is no right to vote in health hazard, double majority, island or triple majority annexations. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unlike annexation statutes that have been subject to strict scrutiny and found to violate the Equal Protection Clause as an improper restriction on voting rights, the triple majority method of annexation authorized by ORS 222.170(1) does not have the have the legal effect of "nullifying a vote," "preventing an election" or "halting an election." ORS 222.170(1) simply makes an election unnecessary; it does not foreclose an election or prohibit the city from submitting the proposed annexation to the voters in the territory to be annexed, notwithstanding that a triple majority of the property owners in the territory to be annexed consent to the annexation. Morsman v. City of Madras, 50 Or LUBA 1 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county does not violate the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) by requiring that an applicant for a church on exclusive farm use land within three miles of an urban growth boundary apply for a statewide planning goal exception as required by OAR 660-033-0130. The exceptions process does not in itself impose a substantial burden on a person's religious exercise and does not constitute unfair delay. Young v. Jackson County, 49 Or LUBA 327 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The term "existing facilities" in OAR 660-033-0130 is limited to a facility that will continue in the same use. The rule does not allow an existing residence to be converted to a church merely because it is an existing facility. Young v. Jackson County, 49 Or LUBA 327 (2005).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a city does not seek appellate court review of LUBA's initial decision that the city's actions to secure consents to annexation are subject to heightened scrutiny, it may not argue in a subsequent appeal of its decision on remand that its actions to secure consents to annexation are subject only to a requirement that there be a rational basis for the city's actions. Morsman v. City of Madras, 47 Or LUBA 80 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A poorly defined code prohibition on "billboards" is not unconstitutionally vague where, as interpreted and read in context, the sign code provides definite and objective standards governing all signs, including billboards, and does not grant the city "unbridled discretion" to approve or deny proposed signs. Media Art v. City of Tigard, 46 Or LUBA 61 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even assuming that an administrative rule prohibition on churches on high-value farmland violates the federal Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), nothing in RLUIPA requires that the local government must go further and relieve the applicant from the obligation to comply with other land use standards that apply to uses allowed in the zone and that do not impose a "substantial burden" on religious exercise. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because Congress intended the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) to subject land use regulations to at least the same level of scrutiny as would apply under the Free Exercise Clause of the U.S. Constitution, analysis of whether an administrative rule prohibition on churches on high-value farmland violates RLUIPA is also dispositive of the same claim under the Free Exercise Clause. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Prohibiting uses that are inconsistent with agriculture on high-value farmland, such as churches, while allowing agricultural-supportive structures and uses on high-value farmland, such as barns, wineries and farm stands, is rationally related to the policy of preserving high-value farmland for agricultural use, and neither treats religious assemblies on unequal terms with nonreligious assemblies nor discriminates against assemblies on the basis of religion in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Prohibiting establishment of new uses on high-value farmland, such as churches or golf courses, while allowing expansion of existing churches or golf courses on high-value farmland does not treat religious assemblies on unequal terms with nonreligious assemblies or discriminate against assemblies on the basis of religion in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An administrative rule that prohibits new churches and schools on land within three miles of an urban growth boundary (UGB), while allowing community centers "operated primarily by and for residents of the local rural community" within three miles of a UGB, does not violate the "equal terms" and nondiscrimination clauses of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), where the membership of the proposed church is primarily composed of people who reside within the UGB. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) does not require local governments to provide for churches in all zones within its jurisdiction, or prohibit local governments from excluding churches from some zoning districts. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Whether a zoning prohibition on churches imposes a "substantial burden" on religious exercise under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) depends on whether the jurisdiction's zoning scheme as a whole fails to provide adequate opportunity to site a church within the jurisdiction. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The actual financial circumstances of a religious assembly, its financial ability to acquire land zoned for a church, and the existence of market-based constraints that apply equally to religious and non-religious land users, have no bearing on whether exclusion of churches in some zones within a jurisdiction imposes a "substantial burden" on religious exercise under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Evidence that a church is unable to acquire land with desired characteristics at a desirable price within an urban growth boundary is insufficient as a matter of law to demonstrate that an administrative rule prohibiting churches on high-value farmland owned by the church imposes a "substantial burden" on the church's free exercise rights, under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Clackamas County, 46 Or LUBA 375 (2004).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Subjective, discretionary conditional use and design review criteria are precisely the type of land use regulations that Congress intended to regulate, as applied to religious practices and institutions, in enacting the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). Although such standards may be "generally applicable" in the sense that they apply broadly to a number of secular and non-secular uses, their application to approve or deny a proposed church requires an "individualized assessment" and thus is subject to RLUIPA. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Application of discretionary design review criteria to proposed religious buildings involves the "proposed use" of land within the meaning of, and is thus subject to, the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), where the local government may deny a proposed church if the applicant fails to demonstrate compliance with such design review criteria. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city's denial of a proposed church based on highly discretionary conditional use and design review standards constitutes imposition of a "substantial burden" on religious exercise within the meaning of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), at least where the city's land use scheme does not include zones where a church is allowed outright without an "individualized assessment," or where the record fails to show that there are more suitable sites in the city where the proposed church would likely be approved. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The regulatory effect of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) is not limited to prohibiting discrimination against religious institutions. Rather, Congress intended RLUIPA to require local governments to treat development proposals for buildings intended for religious exercise more favorably, if necessary, than other development proposals. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the petitioner demonstrates that denial of a proposed church imposes a "substantial burden" on religious exercise under Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), the burden of persuasion shifts to the local government to show that denial is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest. That showing is not made where the record indicates that the proposed church might satisfy local regulations with imposition of reasonable conditions of approval. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) does not overrule or limit the U.S. Supreme Court's free exercise jurisprudence, and thus does not exceed Congress' authority under the enforcement clause of the U.S. Constitution. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) is not an impermissible advancement of religion in violation of the establishment clause of the U.S. Constitution, as long as the purpose and primary effect of RLUIPA is to alleviate significant governmental interference with religious exercise. Where RLUIPA is narrowly interpreted so that its primary effect is to constrain an area of extremely discretionary land use decision-making that historically allowed local governments to discriminate against controversial land use proposals, such as religious structures in residential settings, RLUIPA is a permissible accommodation of religion rather than an impermissible advancement of religion. Corporation Presiding Bishop v. City of West Linn, 45 Or LUBA 77 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An evidentiary proceeding before LUBA is not warranted to consider evidence that the petitioner has installed "light emitting diodes" on an existing sign in order to engage in constitutionally protected speech, where the question of whether petitioner's installation is constitutionally protected speech is a legal conclusion, not an assertion of fact. Meredith v. Lincoln County, 44 Or LUBA 821 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An agreement by a property owner to establish a walkway from a vacated street west of the property to an existing street east of the property, in order to provide pedestrian access to a building on the property, does not necessarily constitute a voluntary agreement to deed a public easement for a sidewalk connecting the vacated street with the existing street. Hallmark Inns v. City of Lake Oswego, 43 Or LUBA 62 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a city requires that a property owner grant an easement across its property to provide pedestrian access between a vacated street and an existing street as a condition of development approval, and determines that the easement will satisfy city requirements for connectivity, the city has established a nexus between the exaction and the city's legitimate governmental interest in ensuring adequate transportation connectivity. Hallmark Inns v. City of Lake Oswego, 43 Or LUBA 62 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In requiring an easement for a pedestrian walkway as a condition of development approval, a city may consider the impacts that reasonably flow from the approval granted, including the possible use of the walkway by employees of the development to access adjoining streets and by residents of neighboring properties to access the development on foot or by bicycle. Hallmark Inns v. City of Lake Oswego, 43 Or LUBA 62 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city adequately quantifies the impact of a proposed development on the area's bicycle and pedestrian transportation system and establishes that an exaction for a pedestrian walkway across the subject property is roughly proportional to the impact of the development where the city: (1) considers the types of uses in the vicinity and concludes that the walkway is necessary to allow access to a transit stop and other neighborhood amenities; (2) explains that persons working at or patronizing the development would be impeded from accessing a neighborhood attraction to the west of the subject property without the walkway; and (3) explains that the subject property could be developed as six individual lots, with sidewalks required for each, and the decision to combine the lots into one development has impacts on the city's transportation system that the required easement ameliorates. Hallmark Inns v. City of Lake Oswego, 43 Or LUBA 62 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Allegations that conditions of approval are unconstitutional exactions are not sufficiently developed for review where the allegations neither explain why the conditions of approval constitute exactions nor explain why the conditions of approval, if they are exactions, violate petitioners' Fifth Amendment rights. Botham v. Union County, 43 Or LUBA 263 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The fact that a city approved billboards 20 years ago under a very different regulatory scheme than the current one has little bearing on whether the city violated petitioner's state and federal constitutional rights in denying its application for a billboard under current regulations. Absent a showing of similarity between the old and new regulatory schemes, evidence of prior approvals does not demonstrate that a city acted arbitrarily or extended privileges to others that were denied to petitioners, and consideration of extra-record evidence under OAR 661-010-0045 is not warranted. West Coast Media v. City of Gladstone, 43 Or LUBA 659 (2003).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local ordinance that requires an applicant for a partition to improve the entire 3,500-foot length of a private road providing access to the property, including widening existing easements across private property and improving the road to full county road standards, is a possessory exaction requiring off-site improvements and is therefore subject to the "rough proportionality" requirement of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). Dudek v. Umatilla County, 42 Or LUBA 427 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even assuming that a landowner's actions can constitute a voluntary waiver of claims under the federal Takings Clause, the act of filing an application to develop land in an area where the city has prohibited development in the absence of essential public facilities is not, in itself, a voluntary waiver of a landowner's rights under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 734, 114 S Ct 2309, 120 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). Carver v. City of Salem, 42 Or LUBA 305 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A landowner's choice to seek development in an area with inadequate public facilities, rather than wait an indefinite period of time until the city or another developer provides the missing facilities, does not constitute a voluntary waiver of the landowner's rights under the Takings Clause, or otherwise allow the city to impose an exaction of land to provide the missing facilities, without satisfying the rough proportionality test of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 734, 114 S Ct 2309, 120 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). Carver v. City of Salem, 42 Or LUBA 305 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The relative importance of the public purpose underlying an exaction of land imposed as a condition of development approval does not justify an exaction that is disproportionate to the impacts of development. Carver v. City of Salem, 42 Or LUBA 305 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To the extent a city relies on a process for compensating the landowner for a required dedication of land as a means of avoiding the requirements of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 734, 114 S Ct 2309, 120 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), that process must ensure that the landowner receives "just compensation." A process for reimbursing the landowner with credits against system development charges is not "just compensation," where the amount of compensation is not related to the fair market value of land, does not include severance damages to the remainder parcel, and does not ensure that the landowner will, in fact, receive any compensation. Carver v. City of Salem, 42 Or LUBA 305 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Eliminating a quasi-judicial UGB amendment process for housing, while providing such a process for nonhousing needs, does not violate petitioner's rights under either the Equal Protection Clause of the US Constitution or the Privileges and Immunities clause of the Oregon Constitution, where petitioner's housing developer members are not a suspect class, and the local government's distinction between housing and nonhousing UGB amendments is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Homebuilders Assoc. v. Metro, 42 Or LUBA 176 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Comments by one local government decision maker expressing frustration at the perceived burdens created by a statute promoted by petitioner is insufficient to establish that the local government, in adopting a legislative amendment to the local government's plan and code that is adverse to petitioner's interests, impermissibly retaliated against petitioner for exercising its free speech and other constitutional rights. Homebuilders Assoc. v. Metro, 42 Or LUBA 176 (2002).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A code criterion requiring that a proposal be shown to be compatible with the surrounding area and to not have more than a minimal impact on the livability and appropriate development of the surrounding area is not unconstitutionally vague and does not violate the ORS 227.173(1) requirement that permit approval criteria be included in the city's land use regulations. Oregon Entertainment Corp. v. City of Beaverton, 38 Or LUBA 440 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Only those impacts that reasonably flow from the approval granted may be considered when imposing exactions to ameliorate those impacts. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. During its review of a proposed partition, a city may consider the impact that future dwellings may have on public infrastructure, where the partition approval is the last land use decision necessary to establish dwellings on the resulting parcels. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. It is appropriate to include some consideration of the benefits to the parcels created by a partition, as well as the impacts from the new parcels, in the rough proportionality analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In reviewing findings adopted to support the imposition of exactions, LUBA first determines if any identified impacts or benefits are not relevant for the purposes of the rough proportionality analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). LUBA then looks at whether the remaining findings adequately quantify the benefits to the development or the impacts of the development on public facilities, and whether those findings suffice to demonstrate that the city's exactions are "roughly proportional" to those benefits and impacts. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The fact that an exaction is required by city ordinance is irrelevant to whether an exaction imposed pursuant to that ordinance is in fact roughly proportional to the impacts of development. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The fact that a portion of the property subject to dedication for transportation improvements will be used for transportation access whether it is privately or publicly owned is not relevant under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), because that consideration is neither a benefit to the property owner nor an impact of development on the public infrastructure. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Benefits to the larger community resulting from the imposition of exactions, as opposed to specific benefits to the subject property, are not appropriate considerations under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In some cases, the impacts resulting from the development may be so great, and the exactions imposed so small, that it is readily apparent without additional explanation that the exactions are roughly proportional to the expected impact. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The impacts resulting from the approval of two residential parcels are not so great as to make it self-evident that the imposition of a 20-foot dedication of right-of-way requirement is roughly proportional to the impacts of the proposed development. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unless a local government makes some effort to quantify the benefits accruing to a particular development, those benefits will be of limited assistance in applying the rough proportionality analysis required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994). McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. If the extent of safety impacts caused by a proposed partition justify some or all of the city's exactions, the local government may impose those additional conditions that are roughly proportional to the safety impacts caused by the approval. McClure v. City of Springfield, 37 Or LUBA 759 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A land use regulation may effect a taking under the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution if it does not substantially advance a legitimate state interest. Homebuilders Association v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 707 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under the Fifth Amendment takings clause, zoning to achieve aesthetic concerns is within the city's police power and is a legitimate state interest. Homebuilders Association v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 707 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under the Fifth Amendment takings clause, public safety and alternative transportation goals constitute legitimate state interests. Homebuilders Association v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 707 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city is not required, under the first prong of the two-part test in Agins v. Tiburon, 447 US 255, 260, 100 S Ct 2138, 65 L Ed 2d 106 (1980), to establish in advance that a land use regulation prohibiting certain housing designs will in fact result in more livable or aesthetically pleasing residential neighborhoods. Where a city regulation directly regulates the design features that the city has identified as negatively affecting aesthetic and livability concerns, the regulation "substantially advances legitimate state interests," within the meaning of the first part of the Agins test. Homebuilders Association v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 707 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a petitioner's disagreement with the city over whether a land use regulation will actually further identified public safety concerns is based on the kind of arguments over which reasonable persons may disagree, LUBA will conclude that the land use regulation satisfies the requirement under Agins v. Tiburon, 447 US 255, 260, 100 S Ct 2138, 65 L Ed 2d 106 (1980), that the regulation substantially advances a legitimate state interest. Homebuilders Association v. City of Portland, 37 Or LUBA 707 (2000).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Consents to annexation obtained pursuant to ORS 222.115, where the consent is given in exchange for the city's provision of extra-territorial services, are constitutional. Johnson v. City of La Grande, 37 Or LUBA 380 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The exactions analysis set forth in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), is not applicable to petitioner's claim that the city effected a regulatory taking in rezoning his property from multi-family to single-family residential uses. Even if the rezoning reduced the value of the property, that is insufficient to establish that the rezoning is a regulatory taking that deprives the property of all economically beneficial use. Herman v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 521 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. To the extent Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), is applicable to a facial takings challenge to legislative adoption of a local ordinance, petitioner must establish from the face of the challenged ordinance that no set of circumstances exist under which the ordinance can be applied in a constitutional manner. Lincoln City Ch. of Comm. v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 399 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The requirement in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), that the local government establish "rough proportionality" between a proposed exaction and the impacts of development does not mean that the local government must assume the burden of producing the evidence on which the rough proportionality determination is based. Lincoln City Ch. of Comm. v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 399 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Depending on the facts of the case, a local government's demonstration of rough proportionality required by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), may require up to three distinct sets of analyses: (1) the extent to which the proposed exaction will benefit the development; (2) the extent to which the proposed exaction will mitigate the development's impacts on the public infrastructure; and (3) whether the benefits and impacts analyzed in (1) and (2), considered together, demonstrate that the proposed exaction is roughly proportional to the impacts of development. Lincoln City Ch. of Comm. v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 399 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Even assuming Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed 2d 304 (1994), addresses whether the local government must originate the analysis used to demonstrate rough proportionality between a proposed exaction and the impacts of development, an ordinance requiring that an applicant submit a "rough proportionality report" is not facially unconstitutional, where nothing on the face of the ordinance requires the local government to adopt or use in whole or part the conclusions contained therein. Lincoln City Ch. of Comm. v. City of Lincoln City, 36 Or LUBA 399 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county provision requiring that schools outside urban growth boundaries be "scaled to serve the rural population" is not unconstitutionally vague where a reasonable applicant would understand that to comply with that provision, the applicant must submit evidence that the school is no larger than needed to serve the anticipated number of rural students. Christian Life Center v. Washington County, 36 Or LUBA 200 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county provision requiring that schools outside urban growth boundaries be "scaled to serve the rural population" does not infringe directly on religious practices, and thus is not subject to strict scrutiny, absent a showing that the proposed parochial school must exist on the same rural property as its supporting church for members to exercise their rights to free exercise of religion and their right to direct their children's education. Christian Life Center v. Washington County, 36 Or LUBA 200 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The appropriate standard for reviewing challenges to zoning laws under the Free Exercise Clause involves balancing (1) the impact of the zoning law on the exercise of religious belief; (2) the existence of a compelling state interest justifying the burden on the exercise of religious belief; and (3) the extent to which an exemption from the law would impede the objectives sought to be advanced by the law. Christian Life Center v. Washington County, 36 Or LUBA 200 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The Free Exercise Clause does not require an exemption from a county zoning ordinance that prohibits urban-sized schools on rural land, where the county has a strong interest in maintaining the boundaries between rural and urban uses, and the ordinance imposes only the minimal burden on religious practice of requiring the applicant to build a smaller parochial school than desired or locate the school on property within the nearby urban growth boundary. Christian Life Center v. Washington County, 36 Or LUBA 200 (1999).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. OAR 660-012-0060 does not require that a local government impose exactions to ensure that impacts from a plan amendment do not violate Transportation Planning Rule Level of Service requirements. Dept. of Transportation v. Coos County, 35 Or LUBA 285 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Compliance with OAR 660-012-0060 does not deprive a property of all beneficial use, where the current comprehensive plan and zoning designations allow a range of uses that may generate any amount of traffic and are not subject to the rule. Dept. of Transportation v. Coos County, 35 Or LUBA 285 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local government may constitutionally distinguish between signs related to on-premises uses, and signs related only to off-premises uses or services, and deny a proposed billboard because it is unrelated to the primary use of the property, where the city's evaluation of the relationship between the sign and the premise does not entail a content-based distinction, and the on-premises/off-premises distinction is a rational means to preserve the zone for allowed uses. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local government does not impermissibly favor commercial speech over noncommercial speech because it allows signs related to on-premises uses in an industrial and commercial zone and prohibits all others. That signs related to on-premises commercial uses are allowed while unrelated commercial and noncommercial signs are prohibited is an incidental consequence of the permissible distinction drawn between signs related to on- and off-premises uses. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city's determination that a proposed billboard is not an accessory use "incidental, appropriate and subordinate" to the primary use on the property is subject to an inquiry so factually and legally circumscribed that it does not render constitutionally protected rights of free expression contingent upon the unbridled discretion of a government official. Media Art Company v. City of Gates, 35 Or LUBA 123 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A facial "takings" challenge of a mandatory public acquisition ordinance, while not subject to the "ripeness" requirement, must nevertheless demonstrate that the ordinance would "take" petitioner's property and that the taking would be uncompensated. Nike, Inc. v. City of Beaverton, 35 Or LUBA 57 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where almost all loss of viable economic use of a property is the result of the landowner's choice to restrict use of the property rather than the city's action in revoking a conditional use permit, the city's action cannot be combined with the landowner's actions to constitute a complete loss of viable economic use of the property and hence a taking of property without just compensation in violation of the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. Cope v. City of Cannon Beach, 34 Or LUBA 441 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The key to determining whether an approval standard is unconstitutionally vague is whether a reasonable applicant could understand what must be done to comply with the standard. Holland v. City of Cannon Beach, 34 Or LUBA 1 (1998).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the accumulation of sand on petitioner's beachfront property is caused by time and nature, and not city's sand removal regulations, denial of petitioner's permit request to remove the sand does not fall within the "physical invasion" category of takings cases. Beta Trust v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 576 (1997).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues A federal takings claim challenging city's denial of remedial sand removal is not ripe for review where petitioner has not requested a grading permit limited to the amount of grading necessary to preserve alleged protected property rights. The city is not obligated to approve something different than what was requested. Beta Trust v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 576 (1997).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a county identifies a rational basis for distinguishing between leaseholders and fee owners for purposes of allowing conditional uses on EFU lands, the county does not violate the Equal Protection Clause. R/C Pilots Association v. Marion County, 33 Or LUBA 532 (1997).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. There is no violation of the right to equal privileges and immunities under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution or the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in applying a code provision to deny an absentee landowner permission to remove a tree, where the code does not create a separate classification for absentee landowners and the record does not show that any of the applications previously denied by the city were submitted by absentee landowners. Lindstedt v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 516 (1997).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The city's denial of a tree cutting permit does not result in an unconstitutional "taking" of the portion of petitioner's property defined by the "circumference and diameter of the foliage and surface of roots of the tree," where petitioner retains "some beneficial use" of the property and is left with "an economically viable use" of the property. The "rough proportionality" test of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374 (1994), does not apply to land use decisions that merely limit the available uses of property. Lindstedt v. City of Cannon Beach, 33 Or LUBA 516 (1997).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will not find that the application of a broad design review standard violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution unless petitioner shows that a policy unlawfully discriminating in favor of some persons against others either has been adopted or has been followed in practice. Johns v. City of Lincoln City, 32 Or LUBA 195 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The difference between modes of transportation on different streets justifies separate classifications for transit mall streets and light rail transit streets. Since the different classifications bear a rational relationship to an end of government (i.e., appropriate forms of development), they are not prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Downtown Community Assoc. v. City of Portland, 32 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the different modes of transportation found on light rail transit streets and transmit mall streets justifies the distinctions made in permitting development on the two types of streets, there has been no violation of the right to substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Downtown Community Assoc. v. City of Portland, 32 Or LUBA 1 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Until LUBA can ascertain whether and to what extent proposed conditions will be imposed on petitioner's property, there is no way of determining whether the conditions bear an "essential nexus" to the impacts of the development and whether any exactions are roughly proportional to the impacts of petitioner's proposed development. Reeves v. City of Tualatin, 31 Or LUBA 11 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A federal taking claim challenging a condition of development approval is not ripe for review where petitioner has not pursued a variance procedure that is available under the local code. Until a variance is denied, LUBA has no way of knowing whether petitioner can be relieved of the contested conditions. Reeves v. City of Tualatin, 31 Or LUBA 11 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city cannot be required to contribute to the cost of the improvements directly proportional to petitioner's proposed development simply because the city owns undeveloped property adjoining petitioner's parcel, where the city has not proposed to develop that property; Dolan v. City of Tigard does not require improvements or contribution from an adjacent property owner simply because that owner may develop the adjacent property in the future. Clark v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 375 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A city satisfies the "rough proportionality" test of Dolan v. City of Tigard where it determines that petitioner's development will receive the sole or principal benefit of the improvements that he is required to make, and that the requirements are directly responsive to the impacts that the development will have. Clark v. City of Albany, 31 Or LUBA 375 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under the rough proportionality test established in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994), the local government must consider both the nature of the exaction, i.e., whether there is an adequate nexus between the legitimate state interest and the exaction, and the extent of the impact, i.e., whether there is a close enough connection or fit between the exaction and the anticipated impact of the development. Art Piculell Group v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 381 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The rough proportionality analysis established by Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994), and J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 131 Or App 615, 887 P2d 360 (1994) requires more than a simple mathematical equation as to the number of cars generated by a subdivision development; rather, the analysis allows the county to consider the subdivision's real traffic impacts to the adjoining road. Art Piculell Group v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 381 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994), and J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 131 Or App 615, 887 P2d 360 (1994), a subdivision developer's fair share of the total cost of road improvements rightfully includes traffic-related impacts by subdivision residents beyond the portion of an adjoining road which actually fronts the subdivision. Consideration of those impacts requires more than a mathematical calculation of the number of cars driving on an isolated segment of the adjoining road. Art Piculell Group v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 381 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Consideration of both the benefits and the burdens of an exaction is relevant and appropriate in articulating whether there is a sufficient connection between the proposed development and the required improvements to justify the exaction. Art Piculell Group v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 381 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA need not determine whether each one of the county's findings independently could satisfy the rough proportionality test established in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994). Rather, LUBA need only determine whether cumulatively the county's findings establish that there is a sufficient connection between the impacts of the proposed development and the dedication and frontage road improvements the county is requiring. Art Piculell Group v. Clackamas County, 30 Or LUBA 381 (1996).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, legislative classifications must bear a rational relationship to a legitimate state interest. Cummings v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 17 (1995).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994), and J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 131 Or App 615, 887 P2d 360 (1994), findings in support of a condition requiring an applicant for site plan approval for a fast-food restaurant to construct certain street and frontage improvements must compare traffic and other effects of development to required improvements. Clark v. City of Albany, 29 Or LUBA 325 (1995).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition requiring an applicant for site plan approval for a fast-food restaurant to design street improvements for hundreds of feet beyond the subject property boundaries does not meet the "rough proportionality" test established in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994). Clark v. City of Albany, 29 Or LUBA 325 (1995).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994), and J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 131 Or App 615, 887 P2d 360 (1994), the city must show a right-of-way dedication is roughly proportional to the impact of a proposed development. To require the dedication when the city finds there will be no impact is unconstitutional. Gensman v. City of Tigard, 29 Or LUBA 505 (1995).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. If a local government approves a proposed partition with conditions requiring exactions, the local government must ensure that the requirement of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 US 374, 114 S Ct 2309, 2319-20, 129 L Ed2d 304 (1994) for "individualized determination[s] that the required dedication is related both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development" is satisfied. Neuman v. Benton County, 29 Or LUBA 172 (1995).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local government does not violate petitioner's right to equal protection under the law by directing its enforcement order exclusively at petitioner, and excluding the property owner, where the property owner attempted to have petitioner remove the use that was the subject of the enforcement order and ultimately advised petitioner he would have to vacate the property. Sanchez v. Clatsop County, 29 Or LUBA 26 (1995).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That a local code's definition of the term "taking" neither accurately nor completely reflects the opinions of appellate courts and LUBA regarding what constitutes a "taking" of private property for public use under the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution or Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution provides no basis for reversal or remand, where the term "taking" is not used elsewhere in the code. DLCD v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 459 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Conditions of land use approval requiring uncompensated dedication of land constitute "exactions." Where a condition of land use approval imposes an exaction, the local government must make an individualized determination that the exaction is roughly proportional in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development. Davis v. City of Bandon, 28 Or LUBA 38 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Aside from the requirement under Dolan v. City of Tigard for an "individualized determination" justifying a condition of approval imposing an exaction, there is no generally applicable requirement that conditions of land use approval be supported by findings that justify imposing the condition. Davis v. City of Bandon, 28 Or LUBA 38 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition of approval requiring elimination of a one-foot "spite strip" separating a new street serving a subdivision from the adjoining property is reasonably related to the impacts of the proposed subdivision and, therefore, does not effect an unconstitutional "taking" under either the United States or Oregon Constitution. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 318 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the local code prohibits residential, but not commercial or industrial, development in certain wetlands, and includes density transfer provisions for residential developments limited by wetlands, but not for commercial or industrial developments, there is a rational basis to justify the disparate code treatment of residential versus commercial or industrial developments. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 318 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a proposed subdivision will add traffic to an abutting arterial street, although direct access to the subdivision will be provided by local streets, a local government approval condition requiring that the developer construct sidewalks, storm sewers and other frontage improvements along the portion of the arterial abutting the subdivision is reasonably related to the impacts of the proposed subdivision and is not an unconstitutional taking. J.C. Reeves Corp. v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 318 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Vacation renters and owners of vacation rental dwellings are not suspect or quasi-suspect classifications which require that a local government have a "compelling governmental interest" to justify regulation of vacation rental dwellings differently than other types of dwellings. A rational basis is sufficient to justify regulation of vacation rental dwellings. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local code provision which regulates vacation rental dwellings to limit their impacts on adjoining neighborhoods and streets has a rational basis and does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Towry v. City of Lincoln City, 26 Or LUBA 554 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The legal analyses applied to vagueness and overbreadth challenges under both the United States and Oregon Constitutions are essentially the same. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That a condition of approval contains an ambiguous term does not, of itself, establish the condition is unconstitutionally vague. Rather, some ambiguity is tolerated where the ambiguous language of a condition is circumscribed by reference to specific, non-vague regulations. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The issue in determining whether a condition of approval is unconstitutionally vague is whether a reasonable applicant could understand what must be done to comply with the condition. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unconstitutional overbreadth refers to legislative action having a sweep so broad that it unreasonably limits constitutionally protected activity. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where petitioners do not challenge findings that a condition of approval is reasonably related to mitigation of impacts associated with the particular development proposal, petitioners fail to establish the challenged action is overbroad. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition of approval limiting petitioners' rights to remonstrate against LIDs does not impermissibly infringe on petitioners' First Amendment rights to freedom of expression where the condition does not require the local decision maker to disregard petitioners' political views about LIDs and leaves petitioners free to object to the formation of a proposed LID in a variety of ways other than by remonstrance. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The protections afforded by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution may be waived so long as the waiver is voluntary and knowing. Larsson v. City of Lake Oswego, 26 Or LUBA 515 (1994).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A requirement for an uncompensated dedication or conveyance is constitutional under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution where the required dedication or conveyance is reasonably related to the needs created by the use for which approval is sought. Louisiana Pacific v. Umatilla County, 26 Or LUBA 247 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A county may not condition approval of a farm dwelling on dedication of over two miles of right-of-way, where the required dedication has no reasonable relationship to needs or impacts associated with the farm dwelling. Louisiana Pacific v. Umatilla County, 26 Or LUBA 247 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition of partition approval requiring that three existing driveways presently serving property to be partitioned be consolidated into a single driveway does not "take" a cognizable property interest, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution or Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution. Such a condition simply requires that a property owner exercise the property right of access differently. Kostenborder v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 440 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where there is a reasonable relationship between the development potential of a parcel to be divided and the impacts reasonably attributable to the divided parcel on the one hand, and the city's need to respond to legitimate traffic concerns on the other, and it would be more difficult to address such concerns when there are three parcels rather than a single parcel, notwithstanding the lack of current plans to develop the property further, a condition requiring consolidation of existing driveways is appropriate. Kostenborder v. City of Salem, 25 Or LUBA 440 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Federal preemption of local authority to regulate is not presumed. Rather it is necessary to determine whether preemption was the "clear and manifest purpose of Congress." Skydive Oregon v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 294 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Nothing in the federal regulatory scheme relating to the regulation of parachute jumping purports to foreclose state and local land use regulation of the ground based impacts of parachuting. Skydive Oregon v. Clackamas County, 25 Or LUBA 294 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a constitutional taking claim is not dependent upon a local government's adoption of a particular interpretation of an ordinance, in that denial of an application for development approval is a reasonably foreseeable possibility, a petitioner is required to raise taking claims during the local proceedings or waive the right to raise those issues at LUBA. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While a local government is not obliged to respond to a taking claim raised during the local proceedings, the local government should, in the first instance, have an opportunity to respond to a taking issue during the local proceedings. Where there is more than one possible interpretation of the local approval standards, the local government should have the opportunity to adopt an interpretation that is constitutional. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The purpose of the requirement under applicable federal and state constitutions that a "taking" claim be ripe, is to allow the reviewing body to know the nature and extent of permitted development before adjudicating the constitutionality of the regulations that purport to limit it. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That petitioners believe a local government will deny proposed development because it does not meet various approval standards, does not excuse petitioners from giving the local government the opportunity to make that decision for itself. Petitioners must make a good faith application for at least some of the conditional uses allowed in the applicable zoning district before a taking claim is ripe for review. Larson v. Multnomah County, 25 Or LUBA 18 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a petitioner has been denied permit approval, but has failed to seek approval of other allowable uses or seek a plan amendment or statewide planning goal exception, the petitioner's regulatory taking claims under the United States and Oregon Constitutions are not ripe for review. Lardy v. Washington County, 24 Or LUBA 567 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. LUBA will not presume it would be futile for petitioners to apply for a comprehensive plan amendment and zone change to make their taking claim ripe for review. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In order for petitioners' claims under Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution and the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, that their property was taken by a local government without just compensation, to be ripe for review, petitioners must show that listed permitted uses cannot be established on the subject property and that they were refused a plan and zone change and approval for other listed conditional uses. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Both the Oregon and U.S. Constitutions require that there be a "reasonable relationship" between a challenged condition of approval and the impacts of, or needs generated by, the proposed development. Sherwood Baptist Church v. City of Sherwood, 24 Or LUBA 502 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The U.S. Constitution imposes a requirement that there be an "essential nexus" between the legitimate public purpose for which a development application could be denied, and the condition imposed. Sherwood Baptist Church v. City of Sherwood, 24 Or LUBA 502 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. In the absence of some reason apart from its origin to treat out-of-state waste differently than in-state waste, local laws that discriminate against out-of-state waste violate the Commerce Clause. Further, the local government bears the burden of establishing that there are no non-discriminatory alternatives available to protect a legitimate local interest that is served by the local law. Riverbend Landfill Company v. Yamhill County, 24 Or LUBA 466 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where no nondiscriminatory reason is offered to justify a local regulation treating out-of-state waste differently than in-state waste, and where no party argues non-discriminatory alternatives are not available to protect a legitimate local interest served by the regulation, the regulation violates the Commerce Clause. Riverbend Landfill Company v. Yamhill County, 24 Or LUBA 466 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The rules applicable to the severability of statutes are also applicable to local enactments. Thus, an unconstitutional ordinance provision will be severed from the remainder unless it is apparent that the local legislative body would not have enacted the regulation without the disputed provision, or the remaining parts of the regulation would be incomplete and incapable of being executed in accordance with the legislative intent. Riverbend Landfill Company v. Yamhill County, 24 Or LUBA 466 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a constitutional taking claim is not dependent upon a local government's adoption of a particular interpretation of an ordinance, in that denial of an application for development approval is a reasonably foreseeable possibility, a petitioner is required to raise taking claims during the local proceedings or waive the right to raise those issues at LUBA. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. While a local government is not obliged to respond to a taking claim raised during the local proceedings, the local government should, in the first instance, have an opportunity to respond to a taking issue during the local proceedings. Where there is more than one possible interpretation of the local approval standards, the local government should at least have the opportunity, if possible, to adopt an interpretation that is constitutional. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. The purpose of the requirement under applicable federal and state constitutions that a "taking" claim be ripe, is to allow the reviewing body to know the nature and extent of permitted development before adjudicating the constitutionality of the regulations that purport to limit it. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. That petitioners believe a local government will deny proposed development because it might not meet various approval standards, does not excuse petitioners from giving the local government the opportunity to make that decision for itself. Accordingly, petitioners must make a good faith application for at least some of the conditional uses allowed in the underlying zoning district before a taking claim is ripe for review. Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 629 (1993).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. An evidentiary hearing at LUBA will not be allowed to show that many, but not all, conditionally permitted uses listed in the applicable zoning district are economically infeasible, where petitioners do not argue that it would have been futile to apply for approval of the other conditionally permitted uses. Under these circumstances, the evidence petitioners seek to introduce would not establish an unconstitutional "taking." Larson v. Multnomah County, 24 Or LUBA 591 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A land use restriction results in a taking under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution if the restriction (1) does not substantially advance a legitimate state interest, or (2) denies the owner economically viable use of his land. Nelson v. Benton County, 23 Or LUBA 392 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under Rutherford v. Armstrong, 31 Or App 1319, 572 P2d 1331 (1977), parcels that would be suitable for farm use, except for their small size, nevertheless are considered suitable for farm use unless it is shown they cannot be leased or by some other arrangement be put to farm use in conjunction with other farm parcels. The Rutherford requirement substantially advances the state's legitimate public interest in preserving "the maximum amount of the limited supply of agricultural land," and thus does not violate the takings clause of the Fifth Amendment, provided it does not leave the property without viable economic use. Nelson v. Benton County, 23 Or LUBA 392 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a challenged ordinance requires discontinuation of a use after expiration of a five-year amortization period, but also allows a property owner to apply for hardship relief if such property owner can substantiate that an investment made exclusively in the nonconforming use cannot be adequately amortized within the five-year period specified by such ordinance, property owners have no basis to contend their property has been taken until they have applied for and been denied the hardship relief. Cope v. City of Cannon Beach, 23 Or LUBA 233 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where the maximum penalty for each separate violation of an ordinance is 500 dollars, and there is no possibility of imprisonment for violating the ordinance, the penalties provided by the ordinance are civil, not criminal, in nature. Therefore, a vagueness challenge based solely on the constitutional vagueness analysis applied where criminal sanctions are possible, provides no basis for reversal or remand of such ordinance Cope v. City of Cannon Beach, 23 Or LUBA 233 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Under both the Oregon and Federal constitutions, taking claims must be ripe for adjudication before LUBA may review their merits. Where petitioners did not seek any form of administrative relief from the applicable regulations, and did not seek either a variance or a plan and zone map change, petitioners' taking claims are not ripe. Schoppert v. Clackamas County, 23 Or LUBA 138 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioner's unsupported assertions that the subject parcel is not suited for any use other than a nonresource dwelling are not a sufficient basis for excusing petitioner from the requirement that he seek approval for other uses potentially allowed under the applicable zone before pursuing a taking claim under the Oregon or United States Constitution. In any case, a petitioner is required to seek quasi-judicial plan and zone map amendments prior to pursuing a taking claim. Joyce v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 116 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A local code criterion requiring that a request for land use approval be in the "public interest" does not require that the local government determine whether denial of the request would constitute a taking of private property without just compensation in violation of Article I, section 18, of the Oregon Constitution or the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Because a local government is not required to consider whether denying a request for land use approval would constitute an unconstitutional taking of private property without just compensation, a local government's findings on such constitutional issues provide no basis for reversal or remand. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unlike a local government, LUBA is specifically required by statute to consider arguments that a local government decision is unconstitutional and to reverse or remand an unconstitutional decision. Therefore, procedural errors a local government may have committed in considering constitutional issues during local proceedings are harmless errors. Dodd v. Hood River County, 22 Or LUBA 711 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Petitioners must seek relief from application of a velocity flooding overlay designation to the subject property through the variance process provided in the local government's flood damage prevention ordinance, before they may obtain LUBA review of any constitutional "taking" claims. Alexiou v. Curry County, 22 Or LUBA 639 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A condition requiring dedication of portions of the applicants' property is not an unconstitutional taking under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, if it has a "reasonable relationship" to the impacts of the proposed development. Nollan v. California Coastal Com'n, 483 US 825, 107 S Ct 3141, 97 L Ed2d 677 (1987), does not establish a new, stricter standard for the relationship required between the impacts of a proposed development and exactions imposed as conditions of approval. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 22 Or LUBA 617 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a proposed larger building and paved parking area will increase the amount of impervious surfaces on the subject property and, therefore, runoff into an adjacent creek, there is a "reasonable relationship" between the proposed development and a condition requiring land along the creek to be dedicated for a planned greenway for management of storm water runoff. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 22 Or LUBA 617 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where a significantly larger retail sales building and parking lot will accommodate larger numbers of customers and employees and their vehicles, there is a reasonable relationship between alleviating these impacts of the development and a condition requiring dedication of land for a pedestrian/bicycle pathway as an alternative means of transportation. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 22 Or LUBA 617 (1992).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Different treatment under the law does not necessarily amount to a violation of constitutional rights to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution or equal privileges and immunities under Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution. Where petitioners fail to explain why the different treatment amounts to a violation of those constitutional provisions, petitioners' constitutional challenges will be rejected. Seto v. Tri-Met, 21 Or LUBA 185 (1991).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Although a county's denial of permission to locate a dwelling on a 50-acre forest parcel may make forest operations more expensive and difficult, where the record does not show the decision denies petitioner economically viable use of the forest parcel, the county's decision does not contravene the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. Lardy v. Washington County, 20 Or LUBA 450 (1991).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. A federal taking claim challenging a condition of development approval is not ripe for review if a variance process in the local code is an available administrative means for petitioners to seek relief from the disputed condition. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 20 Or LUBA 411 (1991).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Neither the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution nor the equal privileges and immunities provision of Article I, section 20, of the Oregon Constitution requires a local decision maker to adhere to a prior erroneous interpretation of a comprehensive plan policy. Reeder v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 238 (1990).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Unequal administration of the law does not in every case constitute a violation of Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Petitioner must show the local government's decision to deny his application was based on race, religion, the exercise of constitutional rights or some other arbitrary classification. McCarty v. City of Portland, 20 Or LUBA 86 (1990).

2.2.2 Constitutional Law – U.S. Constitution – Nonprocedural Issues. Where several different uses are permitted, or permitted subject to review, in the county's General Timber District zone, and petitioners have been denied one type of use, a nonforest dwelling, but have not shown that the other authorized uses could not be established on the subject property, petitioners have not established their property has been "taken" without due process, under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution. Sabin v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 23 (1990).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. Where petitioners argue that the statutory definition of "farm use" is void for vagueness but make no attempt to develop that argument, LUBA will reject the argument. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

2.3. Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. Where petitioner only provides a bare reference to "equal protection" as a constitutional claim, that is not sufficient to afford the local government and the opposing parties an adequate opportunity to respond to the issue pursuant to ORS 197.763(1). Yontz v. Multnomah County, 34 Or LUBA 367 (1998).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. LUBA will not consider claims of a constitutional violation when the petitioner raising the claim does not make a legal argument sufficient for review of the claim. Sparks v. Tillamook County, 30 Or LUBA 325 (1996).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. Even if petitioner has constitutional defenses against an action by a local government to enforce its code fence height limitation, that does not provide an independent basis upon which to compel the local government to grant a variance to its code fence height limitation. Stern v. City of Portland, 26 Or LUBA 544 (1994).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. LUBA will not consider claims of constitutional violations that are not supported by legal argument. Poddar v. City of Cannon Beach, 26 Or LUBA 429 (1994).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. Allegations that denial of a requested plan map amendment based on a plan groundwater protection policy is unconstitutional, because it is economically infeasible to conduct the studies necessary to demonstrate compliance with the policy, are insufficient to establish the policy is unconstitutional. Ericsson v. Washington County, 26 Or LUBA 169 (1993).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. LUBA will not consider claims of constitutional violations where the parties raising such claims do not supply legal argument in support of those claims. Perry v. Yamhill County, 26 Or LUBA 73 (1993).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. LUBA will not consider claims of constitutional violations where the parties raising such claims do not supply legal argument in support of the claims. Joyce v. Multnomah County, 23 Or LUBA 116 (1992).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. Undeveloped claims of unconstitutionality provide an insufficient basis for LUBA to reverse or remand a challenged decision. Cummins v. Washington County, 22 Or LUBA 129 (1991).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. LUBA will not consider claims of constitutional violations which are unsupported by legal argument. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 20 Or LUBA 411 (1991).

2.3 Constitutional Law – Nonspecific Constitutional Claims. LUBA will not consider claims of constitutional violation where the parties raising such claims do not supply legal argument in support of their claims. Torgeson v. City of Canby, 19 Or LUBA 511 (1990).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A county's decision to approve the construction of a bridge and related trail improvements in an EFU zone is both a land use decision and a "permit," as defined in ORS 215.402(4), where LUBA previously concluded that approval of the transportation project including the bridge and related trail improvements is a conditional use in the EFU zone and where the construction of the bridge and related trail improvements constitutes the "development of land" within the meaning of ORS 215.402(4). Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 427 (2020).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. LUBA will reject an argument that the construction of a pedestrian bridge and related trail approaches proposed as a part of a trail development project qualifies as a "fire service facility" under ORS 215.283(1)(s) where the record does not support the county's assertion that the intended use of the bridge is for fire protection. Van Dyke v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 427 (2020).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. In determining whether proposed "agri-tourism or other commercial events or activities" are "incidental and subordinate to existing commercial farm use of the tract" for purposes of ORS 215.283(4)(d)(A), a county errs in relying on a comparison of the frequency of commercial events with the frequency of commercial farming activity on the property to the exclusion of any relevant circumstances, including the nature, intensity, and economic value of the respective uses, that bear on whether the existing commercial farm use remains the predominant use of the tract. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 276 (2020).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Two parcels are not "under the same ownership" and, therefore, not a "tract," within the meaning of ORS 215.010(2), where one is owned by a person individually and the other is owned by a trust, with the same person serving as trustee. Central Oregon Landwatch v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 75 (2020).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Establishing that proposed "agri-tourism or other commercial events or activities" are "necessary to support the commercial farm uses or the commercial agricultural enterprises in the area" for purposes of ORS 215.283(4)(d)(A) is a relatively high hurdle: the county must find that the events are essential in order to maintain the existence of either the commercial farm uses on the subject property or the commercial agricultural enterprises in the area. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 135 (2019).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A demonstration that proposed "agri-tourism or other commercial events or activities" are "necessary to support" an approved commercial activity in conjunction with farm use under ORS 215.283(2)(a), such as a brewery, is not sufficient to demonstrate that the events are "necessary to support" an "existing commercial farm use of the tract," such as the growing of filberts, for purposes of ORS 215.283(4)(d)(A), even where revenue from the brewery "supplements" revenue from the growing of filberts. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 135 (2019).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.441 does not provide an independent basis to approve a dwelling within a church on property zoned EFU, and, where a local code provision provides that "[e]xisting churches may be maintained, enhanced or expanded on the same tract," a construction of that provision to independently allow a residential use of a church as an enhancement to the church impermissibly conflicts with ORS 215.203, ORS 215.283, and ORS 215.441. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 80 Or LUBA 183 (2019).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. While a local government's authority to regulate land use and development is generally broad under Oregon law, a local government's authority to regulate land use on exclusive farm use (EFU)-zoned land is governed by state law. Land that is planned and zoned for exclusive farm use must be used exclusively for defined farm uses or limited listed exceptions provided by state law. Production of marijuana is an outright permitted farm use on land zoned EFU. While state law controls permitted uses on farmland and the regulation of marijuana production, local governments may adopt reasonable "time, place, and manner" regulations for marijuana production. MJAI Oregon 5, LLC v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 366 (2018).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A county's decision is "outside the range of discretion allowed the local government under its comprehensive plan and implementing ordinances," pursuant to ORS 197.835(10)(a)(A), where petitioner's application for marijuana production meets a county's clear and objective standards for marijuana production on EFU-zoned land, no evidence was submitted that contradicted petitioner's assertion that it could and would meet the county's marijuana production standards, and the county relied upon factors and considerations in denying petitioner's application that are not contained in the applicable approval criteria. Accordingly, the proper disposition of the county's denial is reversal with an order instructing the county to grant approval of the application. MJAI Oregon 5, LLC v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 366 (2018).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. OAR 660-024-0050(6) requires that when land is added to an urban growth boundary (UGB), the local government "must assign appropriate urban plan designations to the added land, consistent with the need determination and the requirements of section (7) of this rule, if applicable." OAR 660-024-0050(7) provides lands included with a UGB for a public facility "must be planned and zoned for the intended use and must remain planned and zoned for that use unless the city removes the land from the UGB." A city decision to retain the land's existing Exclusive Farm Use zoning until the land is annexed into the city is inconsistent with the OAR 660-024-0050(7) requirement to adopt concurrent plan and zone re-designation "for [that] intended use." Deumling v. City of Salem, 76 Or LUBA 99 (2017).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.448(1)(a) to (d) provide standards that apply to a proposed home occupation in "an exclusive farm use zone, forest zone or a mixed farm and forest zone that allows residential uses," and do not apply to an application for a proposed home occupation on property located in a rural residential zone. Willis v. Clackamas County, 76 Or LUBA 244 (2017)

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. The uses authorized in EFU zones in counties that have designated marginal lands are generally set out in subsections of ORS 215.213, whereas the uses authorized in EFU zones in non-marginal lands counties are generally set out in ORS 215.283. The regulation of dwellings under ORS 215.213 was originally intended to be slightly more restrictive than under ORS 215.283, as the quid pro quo for more liberal allowance of dwellings on designated marginal lands under ORS 215.317. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 70 Or LUBA 325 (2014).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. The nonfarm dwelling standards codified at ORS 215.284 were enacted by the legislature as amendments to ORS 215.283(3) and new subsections of ORS 215.283. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 70 Or LUBA 325 (2014).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Legislative Counsel's decision to renumber as ORS 215.284(1) to (6) what the legislature enacted as ORS 215.283(3) to (8) does not change the fact that what is now codified at ORS 215.284(1) to (6) was enacted by the legislature as part of ORS 215.283 and 215.283. ORS 215.283 is the statutory regime that applies to non-marginal lands counties rather than marginal lands counties. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 70 Or LUBA 325 (2014).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. As a marginal lands county, Lane County is expressly authorized to apply ORS 215.213(3) in approving a nonfarm dwelling on non-high value farmland in the Willamette Valley. Because Lane County is a marginal lands county, it is not required to apply ORS 215.284(1) in addition to ORS 215.213(3), simply because ORS 215.284(1) expressly applies to lands in the Willamette Valley. ORS 215.284(1) applies to non-marginal lands counties. Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 70 Or LUBA 325 (2014).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Where a planning commission almost entirely relied on the EFU zoning statutes to find that a permit applicant inadequately considered alternatives to a proposed EFU-zoned site for a transmission line, and only belatedly and obscurely relied on a comprehensive plan policy to impose a similar alternatives analysis, the permit applicant's general challenge to the planning commission's legal analysis on cited pages of the planning commission's decision where the comprehensive plan policy was mentioned is sufficient to preserve the permit applicant's right to challenge the planning commission's reliance on the plan policy in its appeal to the board of commissioners. WKN Chopin LLC v. Umatilla County, 66 Or LUBA 1 (2012).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.275(5) requires a county to consider whether the imposition of clear and objective conditions on a proposed utility facility would prevent a significant change in accepted farm practices or prevent a significant increase in the cost of farm practices, and to approve the proposed facility with those clear and objective conditions if the conditions would minimize or mitigate the impacts. Falcon Heights WSD v. Klamath County, 64 Or LUBA 390 (2011).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Goal 3 (Agricultural Lands), LCDC administrative rules concerning Goal 3 and the statutory EFU zone contain a level of detail that frequently requires that counties replicate the statutory and rule language in their EFU zones. Friends of Umatilla County v. Umatilla County, 58 Or LUBA 12 (2008).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Roadways that cross exclusive farm use zoned land to connect two villages in a destination resort are properly viewed as "[a]ccessory transportation improvements for a use that is allowed" in the exclusive farm use zone, within the meaning of OAR 660-012-0065(3)(a). Gould v. Deschutes County, 54 Or LUBA 205 (2007).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A local government errs in geographically limiting its inquiry regarding what constitutes a "farm operation" for purposes of ORS 197.247(1)(a) to only lands "adjacent to" or "contiguous with" the property that is the subject of the marginal lands application. Walker v. Lane County, 53 Or LUBA 374 (2007).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 197.247(1)(a)(1991), which allows counties to designate as marginal land property that was not managed during three of the five years preceding January 1, 1983 as part of a forest operation producing an average of $10,000 in annual gross income, implicitly requires that counties use 1983 timber prices in estimating the annual timber revenue derived from the property. Just v. Lane County, 49 Or LUBA 456 (2005).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 197.247(1)(b)(C) requires that counties use the agricultural classification system in use by the Soil Conservation Service on October 15, 1983, in determining whether proposed marginal lands are predominantly composed of Class VI soils. A county is entitled to rely upon a 1987 Soil Conservation Service soil survey that is a product of the classification system in use on October 15, 1983. Just v. Lane County, 49 Or LUBA 456 (2005).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A county EFU zone limit on farm recreational uses that requires that such uses "be subordinate to the commercial agricultural operation in scope, scale and impact, and shall contribute 'added value' to the commercial agricultural farm operation" does not necessarily prohibit a farm recreational use that generates more income than the commercial agricultural operation on the property. Underhill v. Wasco County, 43 Or LUBA 277 (2002).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Counties may not impose additional local barriers to uses allowed outright in EFU zones under ORS 215.283(1) and also may not allow additional uses in the EFU zone that are not allowed by statute. Bechtold v. Jackson County, 42 Or LUBA 204 (2002).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.283(1)(b) separately authorizes churches and cemeteries in conjunction with churches, but does not separately authorize other uses that commonly are constructed in conjunction with churches. That provides at least some indication that such other uses in conjunction with churches are not authorized by ORS 215.283(1)(b). Bechtold v. Jackson County, 42 Or LUBA 204 (2002).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.283(1)(a) authorizes "[p]ublic or private schools, including all buildings essential to the operation of a school." This language potentially allows a variety of accessory, school-related buildings, and the legislature's failure to include similar language in ORS 215.283(1)(b) where the legislature authorized churches is some indication that the legislature did not intend to authorize a broad range of church-related accessory uses. Bechtold v. Jackson County, 42 Or LUBA 204 (2002).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.441, which limits local zoning authority over churches, but refers to churches and other places of worship as "nonresidential place[s] of worship," provides context for ORS 215.283(1)(b) and suggests that the word "church" in ORS 215.283(1)(b) is not properly interpreted to authorize rectories, convents, or office/dormitories which are used in large part for residential purposes. Bechtold v. Jackson County, 42 Or LUBA 204 (2002).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Absent textual or contextual support for interpreting the word "church" in ORS 215.283(1)(b) as including rectories, convents and offices/dormitories, the general rule that EFU zoning statutes should be interpreted narrowly to limit approval of nonfarm uses applies and the term should be interpreted narrowly to exclude those uses. Bechtold v. Jackson County, 42 Or LUBA 204 (2002).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Uses within a mixed farm/forest zone must comply with the restrictions placed on exclusive farm use zones by ORS chapter 215 and the regulations that implement it. City of Albany v. Linn County, 40 Or LUBA 38 (2001).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 197.685 imposes a legislative duty to consider non-EFU-zoned lands to provide areas that would supplement seasonal farmworker housing allowed outright on EFU-zoned land. ORS 197.685 does not require that an applicant for quasi-judicial approval for seasonal farmworker housing in EFU zones demonstrate that non-EFU-zoned lands are unavailable to provide such housing. Durig v. Washington County, 40 Or LUBA 1 (2001).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Where the ORS 215.283(1)(w) authorization for rural fire service facilities in EFU zones had taken effect, but a county had not yet amended its zoning ordinance to reflect the statutory change, ORS 215.283(1)(w) applies directly, and the county does not violate the zoning ordinance by approving a rural fire service facility in its EFU zone. Keicher v. Clackamas County, 39 Or LUBA 521 (2001).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Rural fire service facilities in EFU zones under ORS 215.283(1)(w) need not be separately approved as utility facilities necessary for public service under 215.283(1)(d) or meet the "necessity test" that is applied to such utility facilities. Keicher v. Clackamas County, 39 Or LUBA 521 (2001).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. In approving applications for permits for uses that are specifically allowed in rural EFU zones by ORS 215.213 and 215.283, counties are not required to apply the case-by-case urban/rural analysis that is required under Goal 14 and 1000 Friends of Oregon v. LCDC (Curry Co.), 301 Or 447, 724 P2d 268 (1986), on non-EFU-zoned rural lands. Jackson County Citizens League v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 37 (2000).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A water utility's proposal to solve a water shortage by drilling wells and constructing related facilities on EFU-zoned land need not demonstrate that it is not feasible to solve the water shortage in some other way than drilling wells. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Once a water utility decides to solve a water shortage by drilling wells and constructing related facilities, the wells and related facilities must be located on non-EFU-zoned land, unless it is not feasible to do so. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A utility facility may be located on EFU-zoned land if it is not feasible to locate the utility facility on non-EFU-zoned land and, in that circumstance, ORS 215.213(1)(d) and 215.283(1)(d) do not require that the utility facility be located on the "least suitable" EFU-zoned land. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. In reviewing alternatives to locating a proposed utility facility on a proposed EFU-zoned site, a county is not required to examine alternatives that would also involve using EFU-zoned lands. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Under Brentmar v. Jackson County, 321 Or 481, 900 P2d 1030 (1995), a county may not apply local land use legislation to deny or condition uses that are authorized by ORS 215.213(1) or 215.283(1), unless the county is required by statewide planning goals or LCDC rules to apply the local land use legislation to such uses. Dayton Prairie Water Assoc. v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 14 (2000).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. That a type of nonfarm use is listed in ORS 215.283(2) authorizes a county to allow such uses in an EFU zone, but carries no implication that a particular use is consistent with the purpose of the EFU zone as a matter of law. ORS 215.283(2) does not prohibit the county from applying a local criterion that requires a proposal to mine high-value agricultural topsoil in an EFU zone not seriously interfere with the purpose of that zone. MacHugh v. Benton County, 37 Or LUBA 65 (1999).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Even assuming that a county cannot categorically prohibit all mining operations in the EFU zone, the county can apply a local standard requiring that conditional uses not seriously interfere with the purpose of the zone to deny a proposal to mine high-value agricultural topsoil, where the county's application of its standard is limited to mining operations that permanently remove agricultural topsoil. MacHugh v. Benton County, 37 Or LUBA 65 (1999).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 321 Or 481, 900 P2d 1030 (1995), circumscribes a local government's authority under ORS 215.283(1) with respect to substantive standards, but it does not prescribe the procedure the county must use when considering whether a proposed use is permitted. Corp. of Presiding Bishop v. Klamath County, 34 Or LUBA 131 (1998).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally OAR 660-33-120 and 660-33-130, which prohibit churches on high-value EFU land, are valid because the uses allowed under the rules are not less restrictive than the uses that would otherwise be allowed under ORS 215.283. DLCD v. Clackamas County, 33 Or LUBA 675 (1997).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 321 Or 481, 900 P2d 1030 (1995), does not prohibit local regulations that implement uses permitted under ORS

215.283(1), and does not restrict LCDC's authority to adopt or apply rules that implement statutory language. DLCD v. Polk County, 32 Or LUBA 16 (1996).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. In Lane County v. LCDC, 138 Or App 635, 910 P2d 414, modified on recons, 140 Or App 368 (1996), OAR 660-33-135(7) was invalidated as exceeding the scope of LCDC's rulemaking authority only as the rule applies to the approval of dwellings on high-value farmland in marginal lands counties under ORS 215.213(2)(b); the Lane County decision did not invalidate OAR 660-33-135(7) as it applies to ORS 215.283(1). DLCD v. Polk County, 32 Or LUBA 16 (1996).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Although a county may regulate or define "commercial activities that are in conjunction with farm use" more restrictively than required by state law, the county's EFU zones may not allow uses that are not authorized by statutory exclusive farm use zoning provisions. City of Sandy v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 316 (1994).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Although nothing in ORS 215.213(1) and (2) and 215.283(1) and (2) prevents a county from adopting an EFU zone that allows uses identified in ORS 215.213(1) or 215.283(1) as outright permitted uses, those statutes do not require that it do so. Brentmar v. Jackson County, 27 Or LUBA 453 (1994).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. ORS 215.316(1) (1993) expresses a legislative intent to retroactively prohibit counties from designating resource lands as marginal lands, and from adopting plan and code provisions allowing additional nonresource uses on such marginal lands, after January 1, 1993. ORS 215.316(1) (1993) does not express an intent to retroactively prohibit counties that have not designated marginal lands from applying either ORS 215.283 (1991) or the supposedly stricter provisions of 215.213(1) to (3) (1991) to their exclusive farm use zones. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Marion County, 27 Or LUBA 303 (1994).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. County comprehensive plan and ordinance amendments affecting a county's exclusive farm use zone(s), adopted after August 7, 1993, are required to implement the requirements of OAR chapter 660, division 33, for important farmland. OAR 660-33-150(3) (1993). 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Marion County, 27 Or LUBA 303 (1994).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. A local government's implementation of exclusive farm use zoning is not the equivalent of imposing a statutory conservation easement. Young v. Clackamas County, 24 Or LUBA 526 (1993).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Counties may adopt EFU zones that are more restrictive than statutory EFU zoning requirements, but may not adopt EFU zones that are less restrictive than the statutory requirements. Harris v. Polk County, 23 Or LUBA 152 (1992).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Acknowledgment under ORS 197.251 certifies that a comprehensive plan and land use regulations comply with the statewide planning goals, but does not establish that a plan and land use regulations comply with applicable statutes. Harris v. Polk County, 23 Or LUBA 152 (1992).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. While counties may not adopt exclusive farm use zones that are less protective of agricultural lands than required by statute, they may regulate agricultural lands more stringently. Avgeris v. Jackson County, 23 Or LUBA 124 (1992).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Although counties may regulate uses within their exclusive farm use zones more stringently than required by statute, the uses that may be allowed within such zones are limited to those specified in ORS 215.313 and 215.283. Greuner v. Lane County, 21 Or LUBA 329 (1991).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Absent some expression of legislative intent to the contrary, the legislature is presumed to have intended that the same term used in different sections of the exclusive farm use statute have the same meaning in both sections. Greuner v. Lane County, 21 Or LUBA 329 (1991).

3.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Generally. Where language in the EFU statues is not precise, and therefore susceptible of more than one interpretation, the interpretation favoring farm use and discouraging non farm use should be adopted. Smith v. Clackamas County, 19 Or LUBA 171 (1990).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Counties are not prohibited as a matter of law from applying separation buffers to marijuana production facilities in EFU zones. Waveseer of Oregon, LLC v. Deschutes County, 81 Or LUBA 583 (2020).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. In determining whether proposed "agri-tourism or other commercial events or activities" are "incidental and subordinate to existing commercial farm use of the tract" for purposes of ORS 215.283(4)(d)(A), a county errs in relying on a comparison of the frequency of commercial events with the frequency of commercial farming activity on the property to the exclusion of any relevant circumstances, including the nature, intensity, and economic value of the respective uses, that bear on whether the existing commercial farm use remains the predominant use of the tract. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 81 Or LUBA 276 (2020).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Establishing that proposed "agri-tourism or other commercial events or activities" are "necessary to support the commercial farm uses or the commercial agricultural enterprises in the area" for purposes of ORS 215.283(4)(d)(A) is a relatively high hurdle: the county must find that the events are essential in order to maintain the existence of either the commercial farm uses on the subject property or the commercial agricultural enterprises in the area. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 135 (2019).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A demonstration that proposed "agri-tourism or other commercial events or activities" are "necessary to support" an approved commercial activity in conjunction with farm use under ORS 215.283(2)(a), such as a brewery, is not sufficient to demonstrate that the events are "necessary to support" an "existing commercial farm use of the tract," such as the growing of filberts, for purposes of ORS 215.283(4)(d)(A), even where revenue from the brewery "supplements" revenue from the growing of filberts. Friends of Yamhill County v. Yamhill County, 80 Or LUBA 135 (2019).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A petitioner may not also operate an exotic animal rescue facility, which is undisputedly not a "farm use," on EFU land where the petitioner uses his or her EFU-zoned property for certain "farm uses," under ORS 215.203. The existing "farm use[s]" do not "legitimize" the concurrent unpermitted uses, nor do they shield the unpermitted uses from county code enforcement action. A Walk on the Wild Side v. Washington County, 78 Or LUBA 356 (2018).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. While a local government's authority to regulate land use and development is generally broad under Oregon law, a local government's authority to regulate land use on exclusive farm use (EFU)-zoned land is governed by state law. Land that is planned and zoned for exclusive farm use must be used exclusively for defined farm uses or limited listed exceptions provided by state law. Production of marijuana is an outright permitted farm use on land zoned EFU. While state law controls permitted uses on farm land and the regulation of marijuana production, local governments may adopt reasonable "time, place, and manner" regulations for marijuana production. MJAI Oregon 5, LLC v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 366 (2018).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A county's decision is "outside the range of discretion allowed the local government under its comprehensive plan and implementing ordinances," pursuant to ORS 197.835(10)(a)(A), where petitioner's application for marijuana production meets a county's clear and objective standards for marijuana production on EFU-zoned land, no evidence was submitted that contradicted petitioner's assertion that it could and would meet the county's marijuana production standards, and the county relied upon factors and considerations in denying petitioner's application that are not contained in the applicable approval criteria. Accordingly, the proper disposition of the county's denial is reversal with an order instructing the county to grant approval of the application. MJAI Oregon 5, LLC v. Linn County, 78 Or LUBA 366 (2018).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A building accessory to farm use that is allowed under ORS 215.213(1)(e) as a building "customarily provided in conjunction with farm use" is not itself a farm use. Bratton v. Washington County, 65 Or LUBA 461 (2012).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Determining whether a proposed building is allowed in the EFU zone under ORS 215.213(1)(e) or 215.283(1)(e) as a building "customarily provided in conjunction with farm use" requires the local government to determine whether the land is currently employed for farm use and whether the proposed building is of the type that is customarily combined with the farm use in question. Because those determinations are not clear and objective, a building permit to approve such a building is not subject to the ORS 197.015(10)(b)(B) exception for "building permits issued under clear and objective standards." Bratton v. Washington County, 65 Or LUBA 461 (2012).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Where a property is to be developed with a commercial or industrial use, the internal driveway on that property that connects the commercial or industrial buildings to the nearest public right-of-way is properly viewed as part of the commercial or industrial use, whether that driveway is labeled as "accessory" to the business or an integral part of the use itself. Wilson v. Washington County, 63 Or LUBA 314 (2011).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The Supreme Court's decision in Brentmar v. Jackson County, 321 Or 481, 900 P2d 1030 (1995), that uses listed in ORS 215.203(1) may not be subject to local criteria more restrictive than the statute, did not automatically invalidate all final, unappealed land use decisions or conditions attached to those decisions that were issued and final prior to 1995, even if those decisions were inconsistent with the holding in Brentmar. Just v. Linn County, 59 Or LUBA 233 (2009).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Whether the county tax assessor in 1971 applied preferential tax assessment to properties that were zoned to allow for agricultural use has little bearing on whether that zone was an "exclusive farm use" zone subject to the limitations of ORS 215.203(1971). Rather, the text and context of the county's zoning ordinance in 1971 is the best evidence. Reeves v. Yamhill County, 55 Or LUBA 452 (2007).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. LUBA will affirm a county's determination that the Agriculture-A zone adopted in 1971 was not an "exclusive farm use" zone subject to the limitations of ORS 215.203 (1971), for purposes of determining whether proposed dwellings under a Ballot Measure 37 waiver must be "in conjunction with farm use," where the 1971 ordinance included a separate "exclusive farm use" zone that permitted only the uses allowed under ORS 215.203 (1971), the Agriculture-A zone in contrast permitted a large number of nonfarm uses that bore no relationship to the uses allowed in the statute, and the obvious inference is that the county did not intend the Agriculture-A zone to implement ORS 215.203 (1971). Reeves v. Yamhill County, 55 Or LUBA 452 (2007).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Pursuant to Wetherell v. Douglas County, 342 Or 666, 160 P3d 614 (2007), a local government may consider "profitability" in determining whether land is "suitable for farm use" under OAR 660-033-0020(1)(a)(B). Wetherell v. Douglas County, 54 Or LUBA 646 (2007).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. That a farm use is not commercial-scale in size, intensity or profitability is not a sufficient basis to conclude that land is not suitable for farm use under OAR 660-033-0020(1)(a)(B). Wetherell v. Douglas County, 54 Or LUBA 646 (2007).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Under OAR 660-033-0030(3), a local government must consider whether land may be used in conjunction with nearby or adjacent farm lands. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 54 Or LUBA 646 (2007).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. OAR 660-033-0030(5) prohibits consideration of "profitability or gross farm income" in determining whether land is agricultural land. That prohibition de-emphasizes if not eliminates the role that the "primary purpose of obtaining a profit in money" language in ORS 215.203(2)(a) definition of farm use might otherwise play in determining whether land is agricultural land. Wetherell v. Douglas County, 50 Or LUBA 167 (2005).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. "Employment of land for the primary purpose of obtaining a profit in money," within the meaning of ORS 215.203(2)(a), includes a proposal for a feedlot where: (1) calves that are bred off-site are brought to the property, (2) they are fed with feed produced both on-site and off-site, (3) the calves are cared for on-site, and (4) waste is collected and used in conjunction with on-site hay production. Friends of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 107 (2004).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Moore v. Coos County, 144 Or App 195, 925 P2d 927 (1996), lends indirect support for the principle that feeding of livestock in pens does not constitute "the produce of livestock," within the meaning of ORS 215.203(2)(a), where there are "no other indices of production." Friends of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 107 (2004).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. ORS 215.203(2)(a) provides that "feeding, breeding, management and sale of livestock" is a farm use. A proposed use that will carry out fewer than all four of those activities may still qualify as a farm use, if it nevertheless constitutes "the produce of * * * livestock," which is also listed as a farm use under ORS 215.203(2)(a). Friends of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 107 (2004).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Where a regulation specifically authorizes a use in one zone and does not authorize that specific use in a second zone, a more general authorization of uses in the second zone should not be interpreted to include the more specifically authorized use in the first zone. However, that principle would not apply to bar finding a particular feedlot qualifies as a "farm use" rather than a "commercial activity * * * in conjunction with farm use," where the legislature's authorization of "commercial activities that are in conjunction with farm use" is no more specific than its authorization of "farm uses." Friends of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 107 (2004).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A county's error in finding that ORS 215.253 imposes an absolute bar on adopting and applying local land use regulations to farm uses provides no basis for remand of land use decision approving a feedlot, where petitioners identify no existing, applicable local land use regulations that apply to county approval of a feedlot. Friends of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County, 48 Or LUBA 107 (2004).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A hearings officer's interpretation of a local code to conclude that a "wholesale nursery" is properly viewed as an "agricultural use" is consistent with the text of the code's definition of "agricultural use," where the term is expressly defined to include "horticultural use." Lorenz v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 635 (2003).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Absent some argument or evidence that calls into question a hearings officer's conclusion that growing plants in a greenhouse is an "accepted agricultural practice," LUBA will reject petitioners' contention that the hearings officer's decision must be remanded for a more detailed explanation of that conclusion. Lorenz v. Deschutes County, 45 Or LUBA 635 (2003).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. As long as the primary purpose of grazing livestock is to obtain a profit from money, that activity is a farm use as defined at ORS 215.203(2), even if the profit obtained is not directly from grazing or selling livestock, but instead from using the livestock as part of a nonfarm business on the property. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 42 Or LUBA 149 (2002).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A 1995 amendment to the ORS 215.203(2)(a) definition of "farm use" clarified that "riding lessons, training clinics and schooling shows" are activities commonly associated with facilities for "stabling or training equines." However, the legislature did not intend that such activities be properly viewed as "farm uses" in themselves, in isolation from "stabling or training equines." Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 42 Or LUBA 149 (2002).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A facility where fruit process water is trucked to a lagoon, stored and aerated to prevent odors and later used to irrigate a hay crop is properly viewed as a "farm use," within the meaning of ORS 215.203(2). Farrell v. Jackson County, 41 Or LUBA 1 (2001).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The requirement in ORS 215.203(2) that land must be employed "for the primary purpose of obtaining a profit in money" by one of the uses specified in the statute in order to be considered in "farm use" is an objective test that focuses on the activities that are occurring on the land rather than on the actual motivation of the owner or operator. Cox v. Polk County, 39 Or LUBA 1 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A proposed use of land may be both a "farm use" and a "utility facility," and where it qualifies as both, the proposed use must meet the approval criteria for both farm uses and utility facilities. Cox v. Polk County, 39 Or LUBA 1 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. When a local ordinance creates an exemption from additional approval criteria for uses permitted in the underlying zone, and the ordinance distinguishes between permitted uses and uses subject to administrative review, it is incorrect to determine that wineries, which are uses subject to administrative review, are permitted uses in the exclusive farm use zone, and thus not subject to the additional approval criteria. Roth v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 894 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. An access road to a winery is an accessory use to the winery. When the zoning for the location of the proposed access road does not allow wineries, the access road cannot be established as an accessory use on that part of the property. Roth v. Jackson County, 38 Or LUBA 894 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Under ORS 215.705(4), an application for a dwelling in a mixed farm/forest zone must comply with the siting standards appropriate for the predominant use of the tract on January 1, 1993. A showing that no farm use of the property, as that term is defined in ORS 215.203(2), was occurring on the tract as of January 1, 1993, does not mean that, by default, the property was predominantly in forest use on that date. Gambee v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 420 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. ORS 215.705(4) requires that a county must determine whether farm or forest uses predominated on a "tract" on January 1, 1993. However, the configuration of the tract is considered as it exists as of the time an application for a dwelling is submitted. Once the scope of the tract is identified, the inquiry turns to whether farm or forest uses predominated on that tract on January 1, 1993. Gambee v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 420 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. In considering which of two uses, farm or forest, predominate on a tract as of January 1, 1993, a county may consider more than the number of acres devoted to farm or forest use to determine predominant use. However, those considerations must flow from the use that was made of the tract on January 1, 1993. Thus, income from farm and forest uses and the amount of activity directed at those uses may be considered, but historic uses and soil capability may not. Gambee v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 420 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Portions of a tract that are used for nonfarm or nonforest activities have no relevance to the inquiry under ORS 215.705(4), which requires a county to determine whether farm or forest uses predominated on a tract as of January 1, 1993. If only a small portion of the property can reasonably be considered to be in farm or forest use, the county need only consider that portion in its determination of predominant use. Gambee v. Yamhill County, 38 Or LUBA 420 (2000).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A county must consider all farm uses in the area, including "hobby farm" uses located on adjacent properties, in determining whether property can practicably be managed for farm use, as required by ORS 215.705(2)(a)(C)(i). Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 37 Or LUBA 297 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. County findings that a parcel has been managed for "private use" rather than for "profit" fail to demonstrate that a parcel "cannot be practicably managed for farm use." Although the statutory definition of "farm use" requires that property be used "for the purpose of obtaining a profit in money," the term "profit" in this context does not mean profit in the ordinary sense, but rather refers to gross income. Friends of Linn County v. Linn County, 37 Or LUBA 280 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Pasturing livestock is a "farm use" as that term is defined in ORS 215.203(2), even though the owner's primary purpose in pasturing cattle on the property is to reduce fire potential by reducing ground cover. DLCD v. Wallowa County, 37 Or LUBA 105 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The statutory definition of "farm use" which requires in part that the land be used "for the primary purpose of obtain a profit in money" by farming, does not require an inquiry into the primary actual motivation of particular landowners. Friends of the Creek v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 562 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. ORS 215.203(2)(a) expressly defines "farm use" to permit "on-site * * * equipment and facilities" used for "farm use," even if it is possible to locate such equipment and facilities on land outside the EFU zone. Friends of the Creek v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 562 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. An irrigation reservoir may be considered a farm use, notwithstanding that the reservoir is sized to accommodate the needs of the supplier rather than the farm user. Friends of the Creek v. Jackson County, 36 Or LUBA 562 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The grazing of livestock on property in conjunction with a larger livestock operation on other lands constitutes the current employment of land for the produce of livestock under ORS 215.203. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A property need not be capable of supporting a commercial farm by itself to be capable of being put to "farm use" as that term is defined in ORS 215.203. Pekarek v. Wallowa County, 36 Or LUBA 494 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. LUBA does not independently analyze the evidence, but reviews evidence in the record solely to determine whether it was reasonable for the decision maker to rely on that evidence in making a decision. Where the written evidence is conflicting and a video tape makes it clear that only small remnants of past farming or Christmas tree growing efforts on the subject property remain among the piles of debris that have been scattered over the subject property, it is reasonable for a hearings officer to conclude there is no current farm use of the property. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Whether composting qualifies as a farm use under ORS 215.203(2)(a) is a question of statutory interpretation, not a question of whether agricultural experts believe composting, in the abstract, falls within a scientific definition of farm use. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A composting operation where all the compost inputs are produced off-site and all of the compost produced is sold for use off-site does not involve "current employment of the land" and for that reason is not a "farm use" as defined by ORS 215.203(2)(a). Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Where petitioners argue that the statutory definition of "farm use" is void for vagueness but make no attempt to develop that argument, LUBA will reject the argument. Best Buy in Town, Inc. v. Washington County, 35 Or LUBA 446 (1999).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The suitability standard requires that the local government consider whether the subject parcel or portion thereof can reasonably be put to farm use in conjunction with adjacent or nearby lands, including land under the same ownership. The local government must consider not only the property's suitability for producing crops but also its suitability for producing livestock, both alone and in conjunction with adjoining and nearby properties. DLCD v. Crook County, 34 Or LUBA 243 (1998).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. There is no indication in the language of ORS 215.203(2)(a) that "other agricultural use" includes uses other than those relating to plants or animals. DLCD v. Curry County, 32 Or LUBA 358 (1997).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. An operation that requires land for grazing horses employs that land for the production of livestock within the meaning of ORS 215.284(2)(b); therefore, a county errs when it concludes that consideration of the potential use of a parcel for grazing horses is not required in determining whether the parcel is generally unsuitable for farm use. Moore v. Coos County, 31 Or LUBA 347 (1996).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The prohibitions against unreasonable restriction or regulation of farm uses stated in ORS 215.253(1) are not limited to local government legislative enactments, but may apply as well to local government quasi-judicial land use decisions. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 281 (1995).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. ORS 215.253 must be read in context with ORS 215.203(1) and ORS 215.283(2)(b), which specifically permit mineral and aggregate operations on EFU-zoned land. Mineral and aggregate operations do not per se unreasonably restrict or regulate farm structures or practices. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 281 (1995).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A condition imposed on a mineral and aggregate operation does not violate ORS 215.253(1) simply because it has the potential of impacting some farm uses. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 281 (1995).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A potential, temporary impact on farm structures or practices on the subject property, caused by an aggregate operation allowed in the EFU zone, is not an unreasonable restriction or regulation under ORS 215.253. Mission Bottom Assoc. v. Marion County, 29 Or LUBA 281 (1995).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Where the term "farm use" is defined in a rural residential zone to include noncommercial farms, and it appears from the challenged decision that the hearings officer may not have considered noncommercial farms in determining whether a landscaping business qualifies as a commercial or processing activity "in conjunction with timber and farm uses," the decision will be remanded. Stroupe v. Clackamas County, 28 Or LUBA 107 (1994).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Even if a local government may establish the level of profitability necessary to qualify as a "farm use," as that term is defined by ORS 215.203, such level may not be set at the same level that would qualify a farm use as a commercial agricultural enterprise. 1000 Friends of Oregon v. Yamhill County, 27 Or LUBA 508 (1994).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Evidence which establishes there are markets for farm products from the subject property, but does not address whether products of the proposed farm will "contribute substantially" to those markets, agricultural processors and the local agricultural economy does not "clearly support" a determination that the proposed farm use satisfies a code standard requiring that "products from the farm unit contribute substantially to the agricultural economy, to agricultural processors and [to] farm markets." Kunze v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 130 (1994).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A local government decision maker exercises both policy and legal judgment in determining whether the raising of large numbers of pigs in a confined area is a use "similar" to farm uses permitted in an EFU zone. Therefore, such a decision is a land use decision subject to LUBA's jurisdiction. Derry v. Douglas County, 26 Or LUBA 25 (1993).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. There is substantial evidence to support a local government's determination that a parcel is in farm use, where the parcel is a pasture for livestock and poison oak is burned on the property to retain that pasture. Leabo v. Marion County, 24 Or LUBA 495 (1993).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. The definition of "accepted farming practices" in ORS 215.203(2)(c) is relevant to whether land under certain buildings is "currently employed for farm use." ORS 215.203(2)(b)(F). This definition has no relevance to whether an undeveloped parcel is currently in "farm use," as defined by ORS 215.203(2)(a). Forster v. Polk County, 22 Or LUBA 380 (1991).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. A finding that "the use of the parcel is farm related" does not satisfy a local standard requiring that the parcel is "currently employed for farm use where the day-to-day activities are principally directed to the farm use of the land." Forster v. Polk County, 22 Or LUBA 380 (1991).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Both the first sentence of the definition of farm use in ORS 215.203(2)(a) and the county code identify as farm use only the production of farm products for sale or otherwise obtaining a monetary profit. J and D Fertilizers v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 44 (1990).

3.2.1 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Generally. Under ORS 215.203(2)(a) and the county code, "the preparation and storage of [farm] products raised on such land for man's use * * * and disposal by marketing or otherwise," i.e. "farm use," does not require that all agricultural products involved in such an operation be produced on the land where the preparation and storage takes place. However, an operation for the preparation or storage of agricultural products where none of the products are produced on the land where the preparation or storage takes place does not constitute farm use. J and D Fertilizers v. Clackamas County, 20 Or LUBA 44 (1990).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. In considering an application for a relative farm help dwelling, a local government is not limited to considering the commercial farming operation occurring on the property on the date the application is filed, and the local government does not err by considering whether a new crop planted after the application is filed, either alone or in combination with the existing operation, is an "existing commercial farming operation" within the meaning of OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a). Wachal v. Linn County, 81 Or LUBA 561 (2020).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A reasonable person would rely on an applicant's testimony regarding their activities managing a farm and their status as the state license holder for an industrial hemp-growing operation to conclude that the applicant is a farm operator and continues to play the "predominant role" in management and farm use of the farm, for purposes of OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a), even where they have hired another company to prepare the farmland for planting hemp seed and to provide consultation regarding hemp growing. Wachal v. Linn County, 81 Or LUBA 561 (2020).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Any permits for residential development on resource land that were issued prior to the effective date of HB 2106 (2019) are eligible for the five one-year extensions provided in ORS 215.417(2) (2019) only if, on the effective date of that legislation, those permits were still in the initial four-year period of validity or the one two-year extension period provided in ORS 215.417 (2017). Landwatch Lane County v. Lane County, 81 Or LUBA 279 (2020).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. On remand, where LUBA instructed the county to resolve whether the project applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation" for purposes of applying for an accessory farm dwelling for a relative, LUBA established that certain findings and evidence are necessary to establish compliance with OAR 660-033-0130(9). The county's findings fall short of establishing that the applicant's farm operation qualifies as a "commercial farming operation," because it is an undefined term, and it is the county's obligation to attempt to articulate the thresholds that separate a "commercial" from a non-commercial farming operation, and to determine those thresholds in the first instance. Although the county has some discretion to determine the thresholds, that determination will necessarily constitute a mixed question of fact and law, subject to LUBA's review for legal error and evidentiary sufficiency. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or LUBA 171 (2019).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. The focus of OAR 660-033-0130(9) and county code that implements it regarding whether the "farm operator * * * continue[s] to play the predominant role in the management and farm use of the farm," is on the farm operator's involvement in farm operations on the subject property, not on off-farm businesses that may relate to the farm operation. The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses do not help establish any element of OAR 660-033-0130(9). The commercial farm operator's involvement in off-farm businesses are relevant to establishing the elements of OAR 660-033-0130(9) only in so much as the time spent on those businesses and away from the farm operation might undermine the claim that the farm operator will continue to play the "predominant role" in the farm operation and requires assistance in running the farm operation. Richards v. Jefferson County, 79 Or LUBA 171 (2019).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A finding that the applicant qualifies as a "farm operator" as defined at OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a) is inadequate, where the finding merely assumes the applicant is the farm operator, and does not address issues raised below that the applicant leases the land to a third person who is the actual farm operator. Richards v. Jefferson County, 77 Or LUBA 152 (2018).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. To qualify as a "farm operator" as defined at OAR 660-033-0130(9)(a), in order to gain approval of a farm relative dwelling, the applicant must establish that he or she will "continue to play the predominant role" in farm use of the property. That qualification may not be met if the reason the applicant requires the assistance of a relative is because the applicant is substantially employed off the farm and does not have enough time to conduct farm operations. Richards v. Jefferson County, 77 Or LUBA 152 (2018).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. To gain approval of a farm relative dwelling, the applicant must qualify as the "farm operator" and demonstrate, among other things, that he or she would "continue to play the predominate role" in farm operations. That demonstration requires some evidence regarding the proportionate contributions of the farm operator and the relative to the farm operation. Richards v. Jefferson County, 77 Or LUBA 152 (2018).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Where the record includes no evidence or findings regarding whether a 119-acre parcel with a hay-growing operation constitutes a "commercial farm operation," for purposes of approving a farm relative dwelling under OAR 660-033-00130(9), remand is necessary to address that issue. Richards v. Jefferson County, 77 Or LUBA 152 (2018).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. An occupant of a proposed accessory farm dwelling who is employed full-time as a long-haul trucker is not "principally engaged" in farm use of the property, and therefore cannot be used to qualify the dwelling as an accessory farm dwelling. Aplin v. Deschutes County, 69 Or LUBA 174 (2014).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Determining whether a person is "principally engaged" in farm use of the property for purposes of qualifying an accessory farm dwelling requires the applicant to submit, and the county to evaluate, evidence that, to the extent necessary, describes or quantifies the amount of time that the occupant will be engaged in farm use of the property, and compare it to the average amount of time typically required for a full time employee of the relevant farm use. Aplin v. Deschutes County, 69 Or LUBA 174 (2014).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Activities that a county may consider in determining whether a person is "principally engaged" in farm use must be activities related to "farm use" as that term is defined at ORS 215.203(2)(a). Activities that are inseparable from general rural residential living do not constitute activities that may be considered in determining whether a proposed farm dwelling will be occupied by a person who is "principally engaged" in farm use, even if such residential activities arguably benefit the farm operation in some way. Aplin v. Deschutes County, 69 Or LUBA 174 (2014).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. LUBA will affirm a county finding that an elderly couple qualifies as the occupants of a "relative" farm dwelling because they provide "assistance" to the farm operation, where there is substantial evidence in the record that advancing age and health issues do not prevent the couple from assisting in the management of the farm. Aplin v. Deschutes County, 69 Or LUBA 174 (2014).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. In approving a property line adjustment between two EFU-zoned parcels to facilitate a proposed farm dwelling, under a standard that requires that the adjusted parcel "qualifies for a homesite," a county may rely on a concurrent county decision approving a farm dwelling on the adjusted parcel to conclude that the "qualifies for a homesite" standard is met, and need not require farm income evidence or adopt findings as part of the adjustment decision that again demonstrate that the adjusted parcel qualifies for a farm dwelling. Louks v. Jackson County, 65 Or LUBA 58 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A lot of record dwelling approval under ORS 215.705(1) does not have the automatic effect of consolidating parcels within the tract in which the dwelling is approved; such consolidation must occur via a formal process that has the legal effect of vacating the interior property lines. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. OAR 660-033-0135(1) authorizes a farm dwelling on a "parcel," which obligates the local government to confirm that the subject property is a unit of land created in one of the ways described in ORS 92 and ORS 215.010, but it does not obligate the local government to determine whether the land use decision or process that created the property was legally correct in the sense that all applicable standards were properly applied and satisfied. Any legal errors in such decisions cannot be challenged in the appeal of a subsequent decision approving a dwelling on the parcel. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. The OAR 660-033-0135(1)(d) requirement allowing a farm dwelling on a parcel only if "there is no other dwelling on the subject tract" focuses on the "subject tract" as it exists when the local government approves the farm dwelling; that the parcel was once part of a different tract that included a dwelling does not prohibit approval of the farm dwelling, if the tract the parcel is currently a part of has no dwelling. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. OAR 660-033-0135(1)(c) allows a farm dwelling upon a finding that the dwelling will be occupied by persons principally engaged in farm use of the land at a commercial scale. Although the rule is ambiguous regarding whether the "land" means the parcel on which the dwelling would be located or the tract that includes the parcel, based on context it is reasonably clear that the unit of analysis for the "commercial scale" inquiry is the tract. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A county errs in finding that a farm dwelling will be occupied by persons principally engaged in farm use of the land at a "commercial scale" for purposes of OAR 660-033-0135(1)(c) based on evidence of ranching activities on a 17,000-acre ranch that the subject tract is associated with, instead of the tract on which the proposed dwelling will be located. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A county is not required to impose a condition prohibiting use of a farm dwelling if the tract on which it is located is no longer used for farm use at a commercial scale. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Seasonal occupation of a farm dwelling is not necessarily inconsistent with a finding that the dwelling will be occupied by persons "principally engaged" in farm use of the property, where the property is located in a high elevation area where pasture and farm use is possible only six months of the year. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 65 Or LUBA 246 (2012).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Where the local notice of appeal fails to identify any issue regarding whether a proposed farm relative dwelling is "necessary," that issue cannot be raised on appeal to LUBA, pursuant to ORS 197.825(2)(a) and Miles v. City of Florence, 190 Or App 500, 79 P3d 382 (2003). Wellet v. Douglas County, 62 Or LUBA 372 (2010).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A farm dwelling is permitted under OAR 660-033-0135(7)(a) only if the property is "currently employed for the farm use * * * that produced" the requisite $80,000 income in farm products. As worded, the rule does not permit a farm dwelling if the current farm use of the property is significantly different from the farm use that produced the requisite income. Chapman v. Marion County, 60 Or LUBA 377 (2010).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A hearings officer does not err in rejecting as not credible testimony that a 19-acre farm produced over $80,000 in revenue from hay grown on the property, where the applicant provided no evidence of how much hay was grown on the property, or documentation distinguishing revenue from the sale of hay grown on the property from revenue derived from the resale of $83,000 in hay that the applicant purchased that year, and substantial evidence in the record indicated that to derive $80,000 in revenue solely from hay grown on the property would mean the applicant achieved yields and prices several times higher than average for the county. Chapman v. Marion County, 60 Or LUBA 377 (2010).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A decision maker is not required to exercise policy or legal judgment in determining whether a replacement dwelling replaces a dwelling that is "lawfully established" under ORS 215.283(1)(s), where a valid building permit was issued for the dwelling sought to be replaced. Biggerstaff v. Yamhill County, 58 Or LUBA 476 (2009).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A local code provision that was adopted to implement the OAR 660-033-0130(9) authorization for family farm help dwellings does not require that an applicant establish that the relative's assistance is required year-round or full-time. Where an applicant identifies varied tasks that the relative will perform and takes the position that the relative's assistance will be particularly needed during times when the only farm operator cannot be present, the applicant adequately establishes that the relative's assistance is "required" under the code. Harland v. Polk County, 44 Or LUBA 420 (2003).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. The question of whether a particular farm parcel size supports a farm operation that contributes to and helps maintain the "commercial agricultural enterprise" in the area, within the meaning of OAR 660-033-0020(2) and 660-033-0100, is similar to the question of whether a particular farm operation is a "commercial farm operation" under OAR 660-033-0130(9). Therefore, a county could require that an applicant for a family farm help dwelling on a commercial farm operation must establish that the farm operation "(1) "[c]ontributes in a substantial way to the area's existing agricultural economy, and (2) "[h]elps maintain agricultural processors and established farm markets." Harland v. Polk County, 44 Or LUBA 420 (2003).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Because LCDC did not define the term "commercial farm operation" in OAR 660-033-0130(9) or draft the rule to expressly provide that only those farm operations that make up the county's "[c]ommercial [a]gricultural [e]nterprise" are eligible for a family farm help dwelling, it is not appropriate to assume that LCDC intended to require that county's derive a definition of "commercial farm operation" from OAR 660-033-0020(2). Rather, LCDC intended to allow the county some discretion in distinguishing "hobby" or "recreational" farms from those farms that rise to the level of a commercial farm operation. Harland v. Polk County, 44 Or LUBA 420 (2003).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A cattle operation with from 26 to 70 head of purebred and crossbred cattle is not a large cattle operation, but a county does not err in concluding that such a cattle operation is a "commercial farm operation," within the meaning of OAR 660-033-0130(9) and implementing local code provisions, where the cattle operation provides the sole source of taxable income for the farm operator. Harland v. Polk County, 44 Or LUBA 420 (2003).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A code provision that allows a farm dwelling on a 160-acre rangeland parcel, rather than the minimum 320 acres specified in OAR 660-033-0135(1)(a), may be inconsistent with the rule. However, the county may rely on its code, acknowledged in 2001 to comply with Goal 3 and the Goal 3 rule, notwithstanding any inconsistency with the rule. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 42 Or LUBA 149 (2002).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. OAR 660-033-0135(1)(c) allows a farm dwelling only if the occupant(s) will be "principally engaged" in farm use, as opposed to principally engaged in nonfarm uses. Consequently, in allowing a farm dwelling under OAR 660-033-0135(1)(c), it is not sufficient for the county to determine that the occupants, as opposed to someone else, will be the primary actors in farm use of the property, where the record shows that the occupants' primary economic livelihood is a nonfarm use. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 42 Or LUBA 149 (2002).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. OAR 660-033-0135(1) provides that a dwelling may be considered customarily provided in conjunction with farm use if it satisfies four standards set forth in the rule. Nothing in the rule requires the county to make a separate determination, in addition to applying the four standards, that the predicate farm use is of the type that is customarily associated with a dwelling. Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 42 Or LUBA 149 (2002).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Income and activities pursuant to a nonfarm business that is authorized by a conditional use permit on land zoned EFU may not be considered, for purposes of determining whether the farm uses proposed to support a farm dwelling are "at a commercial scale." Oregon Natural Desert Assoc. v. Harney County, 42 Or LUBA 149 (2002).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. In considering whether a farm management plan has been substantially complied with, a county is not required to consider issues that could have been presented in a prior, unappealed decision that authorized a property line adjustment for the two parcels that were the subject of the farm management plan. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A bill to the property owner for spraying and planting of trees is substantial evidence that the required spraying was done on the property, notwithstanding that the bill refers to a different property, where the property owner explains during the local hearing that the reference to a different property is an error and LUBA concludes a reasonable person could have accepted that explanation. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A property owner's explanation that required plowing and cultivation occurred at the time Christmas trees were planted is substantial evidence that required plowing and cultivation occurred, where the only contrary evidence is opponents' unsupported expressions of doubt that the required plowing and cultivation occurred. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A county governing body's interpretation that a zoning ordinance requirement that "activities" specified in a farm management plan be implemented did not require that each and every task for which a cost estimate was provided in the farm management plan for each year be implemented is not "clearly wrong," and, therefore, is not reversible under ORS 197.829(1) and Clark v. Jackson County, 313 Or 508, 836 P2d 710 (1992). Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 37 Or LUBA 237 (1999).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. The OAR 660-033-0140 provisions imposing time limits on and providing standards for extension of certain EFU zone permits, including farm dwelling permits, expressly apply only to permits approved after August 7, 1993. OAR 660-033-0140 does not prohibit extension of farm dwelling permits that were approved prior to August 7, 1993 and does not require that the standards adopted by that rule be applied to any extensions of such previously approved farm dwelling permits. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 35 Or LUBA 333 (1998).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. OAR 660-033-0135 and 660-033-0140 have no legal effect on the continued validity of farm dwelling permits approved prior to the adoption of those rules or the county's authority to impose time limits on those previously approved permits or to adopt standards for extending those new time limits. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 35 Or LUBA 333 (1998).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Under ORS 215.428(3), OAR 660-033-0140 may not be applied to applications for farm dwelling permits that were filed prior to the effective date of the rule and were pending on the date the rule became effective. Rochlin v. Multnomah County, 35 Or LUBA 333 (1998).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. The 80,000 dollars gross annual income requirement stated in OAR 660-33-135(7) for farm dwellings on high-value farmland is not inconsistent with ORS 215.283(1)(f), although it conflicts with ORS 215.213(2)(b) under Lane County v. LCDC, 138 Or App 635, 910 P2d 414, modified on recons, 140 Or App 368, 914 P2d 1114, rev allowed, 324 Or 305 (1996). Nichols v. Clackamas County, 32 Or LUBA 113 (1996).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. The county's findings are inadequate to establish compliance with OAR 660-05-030(4) where they do not show that once the proposed level of farm activity is established on the subject property, the property will be "currently employed for the primary purpose of obtaining a profit in money" as required by ORS 215.203. Still v. Marion County, 32 Or LUBA 40 (1996).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. In Lane County v. LCDC, 138 Or App 635, 910 P2d 414, modified on recons, 140 Or App 368 (1996), OAR 660-33-135(7) was invalidated as exceeding the scope of LCDC's rulemaking authority only as the rule applies to the approval of dwellings on high-value farmland in marginal lands counties under ORS 215.213(2)(b); the Lane County decision did not invalidate OAR 660-33-135(7) as it applies to ORS 215.283(1). DLCD v. Polk County, 32 Or LUBA 16 (1996).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Findings with respect to an applicant's need for a farm dwelling do not necessarily satisfy the requirement in ORS 215.283(1)(f) that a dwelling be "customarily required in conjunction with farm use." Ramsay v. Linn County, 30 Or LUBA 283 (1996).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A finding under ORS 215.283(1)(f) that a proposed farm dwelling is "customarily required in conjunction with farm use" must be based on substantial evidence that goes beyond the facts of the applicants' own farm. Ramsay v. Linn County, 30 Or LUBA 283 (1996).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Where a local code requires that a second farm dwelling be shown "conclusively" to be "necessary for the operation of the commercial farm," but does not define the term necessary, it is appropriate to use the dictionary definition of the term "necessary." Louks v. Jackson County, 28 Or LUBA 501 (1995).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Where a local code requires that a second farm dwelling be shown to be "necessary," absent a definition to the contrary or contrary legislative history, the term "necessary" has the same meaning in the Goal 3 context that it has in the Goal 4 context. Louks v. Jackson County, 28 Or LUBA 501 (1995).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. While adding dwellings to the existing dwellings on one parcel of a multi-parcel commercial orchard may provide additional deterrence to trespass, vandalism and theft on that parcel, those dwellings will not provide deterrence on the other parcels and are not "necessary" for continuation of the commercial farm. Louks v. Jackson County, 28 Or LUBA 501 (1995).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Although a code definition of "high-value farmland," unlike the definition in OAR 660-33-020(8), is prefaced by the phrase "for the purpose of locating a limited lot of record dwelling on farmland," that the code definition is specifically incorporated into the approval standards for other types of dwellings on high-value farmland, as required by LCDC rule, is sufficient to establish that the definition must be applied in these other circumstances as well. DLCD v. Josephine County, 28 Or LUBA 459 (1994).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. Following 1993 legislative amendments, small scale farm or forest dwellings are not allowable under Goals 3 and 4, and ORS 215.304(1) prohibits LCDC from adopting or implementing any rule which would permit counties to allow such small scale farm or forest dwellings. DLCD v. Douglas County, 28 Or LUBA 242 (1994).

3.2.2 EFU Statute/Ordinances – Farm Uses – Farm Dwellings. A finding that simply states the farm management plan submitted by an applicant for farm dwelling approval meets the local code's definition of "commercial farm" is impermissibly conclusory. Kunze v. Clackamas County, 27 Or LUBA 130 (1994).
